which Theaetetus, Eudoxus, and Aristotle were members. Plato's father, Ariston, traced his descent from Codrus, the legendary king of Athens. His mother, Perictione, also of aristocratic birth, was a descendant of Solon. But from association with other members of his family he became familiar with the background and outlook of democracy in its Periclean form. As a young man, he had had a thorough training in music, mathematics, and letters; he was also an accomplished athlete and a witty writer. With his ability, family background, and political connections, he would naturally have proceeded to take part in public life, but for the tragic death, in 399 B.C., of Socrates. For a time thereafter he withdrew to Megara, to the home of Eucleides, and there is a tradition that he spent some years in travel, visiting Egypt, Cyrene, Sicily, and parts of Italy, before returning to Athens in 387 B.C. There he founded his school in the garden of a gymnasium that had been named Academy for the hero Academus, who told the Dioscuri where they could find their sister Helen after she had been abducted by Theseus and Pirithous. In later life (367 and 361 B.C.) Plato was invited to Syracuse with the idea of initiating its ruler, Dionysius II, into the philosophy suitable for a "philosopher-king." It is said that Plato sought to teach Dionysius philosophy from the ground up, and started him out with geometry, for which Dionysius soon lost his enthusiasm. Jealousies and misunderstandings made the situation impossible, and Plato's freedom of movement was for a time curtailed. On the return voyage, it is said that his vessel was intercepted, and that Plato, as a captured enemy alien, was exposed for sale in the slave market at Aegina. He was purchased by a former pupil, who restored him to the Academy, which he never again left. The Academy, over which he presided for forty years altogether, was attended by large numbers of educated men, and even by women. Plato's teaching was carried on in the manner of informal conversations with his followers. He never married. To the end of his long life he pursued his activities of teaching and writing and, it is said, he was engaged in composing one of his works when a gentle death overtook him. Plato himself regarded academic teaching as his main activity, but shortly after the death of Socrates he commenced the series of Dialogues upon which, for the modern reader, his influence as a great philosopher chiefly depends. In the earlier Dialogues we see depicted a "Socrates made young and handsome," the embodiment of courage, temperance, justice, and wisdom: moving freely in society, among young men, among intellectuals, sometimes in happy, sometimes in trying circumstances. Always we feel his challenge to "tend our souls," i.e., to become "friends of ideas," members of the new spiritual Academy. The Dialogues are dramatic, not doctrinal, presentations. Nevertheless, the modern reader finds himself impelled to participate in the discussions, and to construct from somewhere within himself what he takes to be implied in the Socratic ideal of reflective citizenship. This is always something beyond the "tendance of the soul," which was all that Socrates himself claimed as the content of his mission in life. In the series of Dialogues culminating in the Republic, the modern reader senses the pull of a consistent philosophy: uncompromising idealism applied to the construction of a perfect human community. Such a community exists only in idea; but the neophyte is urged to walk in its ways, whatever his local citizenship. Actually, what emerges in the mind of the modern reader is usually a mirror-image of what idealism that reader's mind possesses within itself. Accordingly, what is acclaimed as "the philosophy of Plato" varies with the background and outlook of the acclaimer. Nevertheless, it is upon the subjective interaction of modern minds with the Dialogues representing "middle Platonism," especially the Republic, that Plato's great influence still depends. It is thought to go beyond the teaching of Socrates, but not beyond the spirit of his teaching.

The later Dialogues are more technical. They throw light upon the studies pursued in the Academy and provide a somewhat abstract and arid intellectual training. They also present views of three rival philosophic schools: 1) an abstract idealism, 2) a concrete and rather naïve realism, and 3) a form of humanism which is regarded as a precursor of modern pragmatism. The earlier idealism is apparently refuted (in the Parmeni- des), the highest good is sought in "the mixed life" (Philebus), and in the latest Dialogue (The Laws), the transcendentalism of the Republic is withdrawn in favor of a "second-best" or "model" city, in which full justice is done to the teachings of experience. At the same time, the Laws end with an expression of faith in the Academy as the most vital of social institutions.

Plato. Athenian comic poet, active 428–389 B.C. He is ranked among the very best of the poets of the Old Comedy. He carried on a poetic contest with Aristophanes, and attacked the demagogues Cleon, Hyperbolus, Agyrrhius, and Cleophon. Fragments only of his works are extant.

Plato. Greek bust in bronze, of the first half of the 4th century B.C., in the Museo Nazionale, Naples, once supposed to represent the great philosopher. Many consider it a bearded type of Dionysius; some, the famous Poseidon of Tarentum.

Plautus (plô'tus). [Full name, Titus Maccius Plautus.] Roman comic dramatist, born at Sarsina, Umbria, Italy, c251 B.C.; died 184 B.C. Although he was unquestionably the most famous and most popular of ancient Roman writers of comedy, the details of his life are virtually unknown. Some say he came to Rome and worked for a miller, and that it was while thus employed that he first began to write comedies in verse. It seems reasonably certain that he was intimately connected with the stage from a comparatively early age, if only because of the remarkable knowledge of stage technique manifested in his plays (indeed, his works remain today among the most widely read and enjoyed of the Latin classics). He drew much from Menander and the other dramatists of the Greek New Comedy (including stock characters, such as the clever, unscrupulous slave, and stock situations, involving mistaken identity and carefully contrived misunderstandings between two lovers), but he wrote in the popular idiom of his day. As a result his plays do not merely ape those of the Greeks, but are vigorous, often coarse, always amusing examples of practical stagecraft. His works were extremely popular in his own day, and were read and often adapted by such later writers as Molière who modeled his Avare (Miser) on a play of Plautus, and by Jonson, and Shakespeare. Of his comedies, 21 (nearly all complete) are extant. Among them are Amphitruo, notable for being a comic treatment of a mythical subject (but the subject of Amphitryon has been a favorite with writers of all ages, comic and otherwise), Captivi, Aulularia, Trinummus, Rudens, Miles Gloriosus, Mostellaria, Pseudolus, and Menaechmi.

Plavis (plā'vis). [Modern name, Piave.] River in Italy, which flows into the Adriatic Sea about 20 miles NE of Venetia (Venice).

Pleiades (plē'a-dēz, plī-). [Also: Pleiads.] In Greek mythology, the daughters of Atlas and Pleione. They were born on Mount Cyllene in Arcadia, and their names are: Alcyone, Celaeno, Electra, Maia, Merope, Sterope (or Asterope), and Taygete. According to some accounts they were transformed into doves by the gods to protect them from Orion who had been pursuing them for five years, and their images were set among the stars. Others say they killed themselves in grief for their sisters, the Hyades, and were placed among the stars by the gods. Only six of them are visible in the cluster because Merope, ashamed that she was the only one of the sisters to have married a mortal, withdrew. Other accounts say it is Electra who is missing, and that she withdrew so that she would not be compelled to witness the fall of Troy, founded by her son. Literally, Pleiades means "The Weepers;" they are also called the Seven Sisters. Their rising is the signal that the time for the spring sowing is at hand, and their setting marks the time of harvest. See individual entries.

Pleione (plē-i'ō-nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She was the wife of Atlas and the mother of the seven Pleiades. See Pleiades.

Plexippus (plek-si'pus). In Greek legend, a brother of Althaea, the mother of Meleager. He took part in the Calydonian Hunt and was later killed by Meleager for trying to take the boar's hide from Atalanta, to whom Meleager had awarded it. It was because of the murder of her brother that Althaea cast into the fire the charred block of wood which, according to a prophecy at his birth, would bring the end of Meleager's life when it had burned to ashes.

Plexippus. In Greek mythology, a son of

Phineus and Cleopatra. He was also known as Parthenius. See Pandion, son of Phineus. Pliny (plin'i). [Called Pliny the Elder; full Latin name, Caius Plinius Secundus.] Roman naturalist, born at Novum Comum (now Como), Italy, 23 A.D.; perished in the eruption of Vesuvius, Aug., 79 A.D. He went to Rome in his early youth, served in Africa, and was, at the age of 23, commander of a troop of cavalry in Germany. While there, it is said, the ghost of Drusus Nero (Roman general who died in Germany, 9 A.D.), appeared to him as he slept and asked Pliny to rescue his memory from oblivion. Inspired by this dream, Pliny undertook to write a complete history of the German Wars. He produced the Bellorum Germaniae Libri, in 20 books, which no longer is extant. He returned to Rome and studied law, was procurator in Spain under Nero (c70-72), and was charged with other official duties in various parts of the empire. His literary work, which was conducted with extraordinary industry in the intervals of his official labors (scarcely a waking moment of day or night being left unoccupied), extended into the departments of tactics, history, grammar, rhetoric, and natural science. His reading was enormous; it is said that he made notes on all the books he read on the ground that no book was so bad that there wasn't some good in it; and he was called the most learned man of his day. Of his writings, only his Natural History (Historia Naturalis) is extant. An elaborate and valuable scientific encyclopedia in 37 books, it covers anthropology, zoology, pharmacology, and mineralogy. He drew his material from nearly 500 authors of antiquity to which he applied his own standards of criticism. For example, he rejected some material from the Greeks as being manifestly impossible and unscientific, but on the other hand, in the books on the anthropology of man and the animals, he included descriptions of fabulous creatures and marvelously made men as part of his array of "facts." He describes the "Umbrella-foots," who turned on their backs and used their big feet to protect them from the sun; and he tells of winged horses, unicorns, Tritons, and Nereids. Yet, at the same time, he records many sound scientific observations. In the last books of the work he treats the use of minerals in medicine and in art and in connection with the latter describes many art works—paintings and sculpture—of antiquity. The death of Pliny, vividly described by his nephew Pliny the Younger in a letter to the historian Tacitus, was the result of his efforts to observe more closely the eruption of Vesuvius, and to aid those who were in danger.

Pliny. [Called Pliny the Younger; full Latin name, Caius Plinius Caecilius Secundus.] Roman author; born at Novum Comum (now Como), Italy, 62 A.D.; died 113. He was a nephew of the elder Pliny, under whose will he was adopted as a son. He was a consul in 100, and later (111 or 112) governor of Bithynia and Pontica. He was a friend of Trajan and Tacitus. His Epistles and a eulogy of Trajan have been preserved. The most celebrated of his letters is one to Trajan concerning the treatment of the Christians in his province and describing their practices.

Plisthenes (plis'thē-nēz). [Also: Pleisthenes.] In Greek legend, a son of Atreus and his first wife Cleola. He was brought up in Thyestes' court. According to some accounts, Thyestes sent Plisthenes to kill Atreus, but Atreus killed him instead, unaware that he was his own son. Others say Atreus sent messengers to murder Thyestes' son, and that Thyestes, learning of the plot, arranged it so that Plisthenes was slain instead. Some say it was to avenge the death of Plisthenes that Atreus later cut up, cooked, and served Thyestes' sons to him at a banquet. Another Plisthenes was the son of Pelops and Hippodamia, and some say he was the father by Aërope of Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Plotae (plō'tē). According to some accounts, floating islands in the Ionian Sea. To these islands the Boreadae pursued the Harpies who had been tormenting Phineus. Here they were commanded by Iris not to slay the "Hounds of Zeus" and received a promise from Iris that the Harpies would torment Phineus no more. Therefore, the Boreadae turned back, and the islands then became known as the "Islands of Turning," the Strophades.

Plutarch (plō'tärk). Greek essayist, author, and priest of Pythian Apollo, born c46 A.D. at Chaeronea, Boeotia, Greece; died there, c120. He was educated at Athens, traveled in Egypt, and spent some time in Rome, where he became acquainted with the emperor Hadrian who made him procurator of Greece. Among his many works are the Opera Moralia, essays on ethical principles. One such is a dialogue to show the moral superiority of many animals over man in which the speakers are Circe, Odysseus, and a pig; in this discussion the pig is the winner. Others, the titles of which indicate Plutarch's interests, are On Virtue and Vice, On the Late Vengeance of the Deity, On Superstition, to name a few of the 60 essays attributed to him in this group. These essays, aside from their own interest, are valuable for the numerous and frequently long citations in them from Greek poems that have since been lost. He wrote on religion, as On the Oracles of the Pythian Priestess, On Isis and Osiris, Why the Oracles Are Silent, extremely valuable and interesting for the archaeological material and religious history preserved in them; on natural history, as On Rivers, which also included mythological references; on history and literature, as in Greek and Roman Questions. Among many other extant works is a letter, Consolation to His Wife, on the loss of their young daughter, which indicates that he had been initiated into the mysteries of Dionysus and his acceptance of the comfort of the belief that the soul is immortal. He is most celebrated as the author of 46 "Parallel Lives." These Lives are paired, for the most part, so as to consider one famous Greek and the famous Roman who most closely parallels him, as Theseus and Romulus, for example, the legendary founders of Athens and Rome. To his sympathetic, humane, and hero-worshipping (especially of the Greeks) Lives he brings quotations and material from many sources: solid historical fact, glorious legend, and his own ethical and religious reflections. According to K. O. Müller (History of the Literature of Ancient Greece), "In spite of all exceptions on the score of inaccuracy, want of information, or prejudice, Plutarch's lives must remain one of the most valuable relics of Greek literature, not only because they stand in the place of many volumes of lost history, but also because they are written with a graphic and dramatic vivacity, such as we find in few biographies, ancient or modern."

Pluto (plō'tō). In Greek mythology, a cult name of Hades, god of the infernal regions. The word means "rich one" or "wealth-giver," and thus he is associated with Plutus. Pluto is commonly the name used for him in the Persephone abduction myth. The Romans called him Dis.

Plutus (plō'tus). In Greek mythology, a personification of wealth; a son of Iasion and Demeter, and intimately associated with Irene, goddess of peace, who is often represented in art holding the infant Plutus. Zeus is said to have blinded him in order that he might not bestow his favors exclusively on good men, but should distribute his gifts without regard to merit (however, by some accounts he was later cured and gave wealth only to those whom he could see were honest).

Plutus, The. Comedy of Aristophanes, produced 388 B.C. It concerns Plutus, the god of wealth, who, being blind, distributes his favors indiscriminately. The play takes up various schemes by which Plutus' eyesight may be restored, so that his wealth will be distributed with a more just hand. The comedy ridicules rising theories concerning a more equitable distribution of wealth among the classes.

Pluvius (plō'vi-us). In Roman mythology, an epithet of Jupiter in reference to his function as rain-giver.

Plynteria (plin-tē'ri-a). One of the two principal days of a festival held at Athens in honor of Athena from the nineteenth to the twenty-fifth of the month Thargelion (last of May and beginning of June). This was a "washing" festival. The image of the goddess was removed from the Erechtheum on the Acropolis and the garments enfolding it were taken off. Veiled, so that the eyes of the populace could not behold it, the image was carried in a solemn procession to the sea. Those who marched in the procession carried cakes of dried figs in their hands. At the seaside the image was washed in sea water. The garments were also washed. The immersion in sea water was a purifying rite, as Iphigenia pretended she would purify the image of Artemis in Tauris, polluted by being seen by a matricide, by washing it in the sea. The rites of washing the image were performed by priestesses called Plyntrides. The day on which this ceremony fell was considered an unlucky one, because the goddess was not in her temple, and therefore no public business was transacted on this day. The companion day of the Plynteria was the Callynteria, which fell earlier in the month Thargelion, and involved the cleansing of Athena's temple. Both were in preparation for the offering of first fruits to the goddess.

Pnyx (niks). Hill between the Museum Hill and the Hill of the Nymphs, above the Agora, in the group SW of the Acropolis, at Athens, Greece; also, a famous ancient place of public assembly established on the N slope of this hill, beneath the summit. The place of assembly consists of a terrace, bounded at the back by a vertical cutting 13 feet high in the rock at the summit of the hill, and supported by a curved retaining wall, built of well-jointed polygonal masonry in huge blocks. Some of the courses of this retaining wall have disappeared, so that the terrace now slopes downward, while originally it was level or ascended slightly toward the back. The length of the terrace is 395 feet and its width 212 feet. The back wall is not straight, but forms an open obtuse angle, at the apex of which projects a huge cube of rock, rising from three steps and ascended by a small flight of steps in the angle at each side. This is the bema, or orators' platform, from which Demosthenes and other great Athenian political orators delivered their harangues.

Po (pō). [Latin, Padus, Eridanus.] Largest river in Italy. It rises in Monte Viso (Mons Vesulus) in the Alps on the French border, flows NE and then generally E, traversing a wide, fertile, and nearly level plain, and empties by several mouths into the Adriatic Sea (Mare Adriaticum). Its chief tributaries are the Tanaro (Tanarus) and Trebbia (Trebia) on the right, and the Dora Baltea (Duria Major), Sesia (Sessites), Ticino (Ticinus) (draining Lake Maggiore, Lacus Verbanus), Adda (Addua) (draining Lake Como, Lacus Larius), Oglio (Ollius) (draining Lake Iseo, Lacus Sebinus), and Mincio (Mincius) (draining Lake Garda, Lacus Benacus) on the left. The chief places on its banks are Turin (Taurosia), Piacenza (Placentia), and Cremona.

Podarces/Poliatas

Machaon, both "excellent leeches," accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan War as physicians. According to some accounts, Podalirius healed Philoctetes of his noisome wound when he was brought from Lemnos to Troy in the last year of the war. Others say it was Machaon who cured him. Podalirius tended the wounds the Greeks received at the hands of the Trojans as well as the wounds they gave each other, as at the funeral games for Achilles. When Machaon was killed Podalirius was wild with grief and was only prevented from taking his own life on his brother's grave by the persuasion of Nestor. Later he was among those who entered Troy in the Wooden Horse. He did not sail for Greece at the close of the war, but went overland to Colophon in Caria and then, searching for a place to settle, he chose Symos, in Caria, a spot ringed by mountains. He selected this site to fulfill instructions given by the oracle to go where he would be safe, even if the skies should fall. He shrewdly considered that the mountains surrounding his new home would hold up the skies if they should temporarily slip from their moorings.

Podarces (pō-dār'sēz). The original name of Priam. When Heracles attacked Troy to punish Laomedon for reneging on his promise, he killed Laomedon and all of his sons except Podarces. He took Hesione captive and awarded her to Telamon. Hesione was given the chance to ransom any of the prisoners she chose and she chose her brother Podarces, after which he took the name Priam.

Podarces. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Iphiclus, a grandson of Phylacus, and a descendant of Ares. He was the younger brother of Protesilaus. When Protesilaus was slain, in fulfillment of the prophecy that the first Greek to land at Troy would die, Podarces assumed command of the Phthians who had followed the brothers to Troy.

Podarge (pō-dār'jē). In Greek mythology, a Harpy. She was the mother, by Zephyr (the West Wind) of the immortal horses Balius and Xanthus, which Poseidon gave to Peleus at his marriage to Thetis. The horses afterward went to the Trojan War with Achilles.

Podes (pō'dēz). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan. Though not of noble blood, he was a comrade and table companion of Hector.

He was slain by Menelaus in the struggle for possession of the body of Patroclus.

Poeas (pē'ās). In Greek legend, a king of Meliboea, in Thessaly. He was an Argonaut and, according to some accounts, as the Argonauts passed Crete on their way home Poeas killed Talos, the bronze man of Crete, by shooting him in his vulnerable heel with a poisoned arrow. When Heracles, in agony as the result of the burns of a poisoned robe, begged that someone would light the funeral pyre on which he was lying, only Poeas had the courage and sympathy to cast the brand which set the pyre afire. In return Heracles gave him his bow and arrows, which Poeas later gave to his own son Philoctetes to take to Troy. Others say it was Philoctetes, at the command of Poeas, who set fire to the pyre and received the bow and arrows.

Poena (pē'na). [Also: Poine.] A goddess of punishment and a companion of Nemesis. Poena is also pictured as a monster who robbed mothers of their children. She was sent by Apollo to ravage Argos to punish Argos for the deaths of Linus and Psamathe. The depredations of Poena ceased when the Argives raised a temple to Apollo and established a festival in honor of Linus and Psamathe.

Polemarch (pol'e-märk). A title of several officials in ancient Greek states. At Athens the polemarch was the third archon, who was, as late as Marathon (490 B.C.), the titular military commander-in-chief, and was later a civil magistrate having under his especial care all strangers and temporary sojourners in the city, and all children of parents who had lost their lives in the service of their country.

Polemon (pō'le-mon). Platonic philosopher of Athens, the successor (314 B.C.) of Xenocrates as head of the Academy. He died 270 B.C.

Polias (pol'i-ās). An epithet of Athena in her role as protectress of cities. There was a temple of Athena Polias (Of the City) on the Acropolis at Athens. In it was a wooden image of Hermes said to have been dedicated by Cecrops. Other temples of Athena Polias were at Troezen, Erythrae in Asia Minor, and Arcadia.

Poliatas (po-li-ā'tās). An epithet of Athena,

meaning "Keeper of the City." At the sanctuary of Athena Poliatis at Tegea the priest entered but once a year.

Polieus (pol'i-ūs). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Urban." There were altars and images of Zeus Polieus in many cities in Greece and on the Acropolis at Athens. In the time when Erechtheus was king of Athens, the following ritual was observed: An ox was killed before the altar of Zeus Polieus. The unknown slayer left the ox where it was and went into exile. When the slain ox and the ax were discovered the ax was tried for murder and was acquitted. From this arose the custom of placing barley and water upon the altar of Zeus Polieus before sacrificing to him. The ox intended for the sacrifice, left to itself, would go to the altar and eat the barley. The priest would run out, slay the ox, and then cast aside the ax and run away. The other priests of Zeus Polieus then tried the ax for murder, as if they did not know who had killed the ox, and acquitted it.

Poliorectes (pol'i-ôr-sē'tēz), Demetrius. See Demetrius I (of Macedonia).

Polites (po-lī'tēz). In Greek legend, one of the 50 sons of Priam. His mother was Hecuba. Because of his great speed, he served as a sentinel on a barrow outside the walls of Troy when the city was attacked by the Greeks. He fought bravely when the Greeks, with the aid of the Wooden Horse, overran the city. He was the last of Priam's sons to survive, and was killed before his father's eyes by Neoptolemus, who cut him down before the altar of Zeus in the courtyard of Priam's palace.

Polites. In the Odyssey, one of the companions of Odysseus on his long wanderings after the Trojan War. He was one of those turned into swine by Circe, and rescued by Odysseus.

Poliuchus (pol-i-ū'kus). Epithet of Athena, meaning "City-protecting." There was a sanctuary of Athena Poliuchus on the citadel in Sparta.

Pollio (pol'i-ō), Caius Asinius. Roman politician, military commander, orator, author, critic and patron of literature. He was born c76 B.C.; died at Tusculum, Italy, 5 A.D. He was an adherent of Julius Caesar, took part in the battle of Pharsalus (48 B.C.), and later commanded against Pompey's son in Spain.

After the assassination of Caesar he became a partisan of Mark Antony, and was named governor of Transpadane Gaul. In 40 B.C. he was consul and helped to reconcile Octavian and Antony. He defeated the Parthians in Illyria in 39 B.C. For this victory he was honored with a triumph at Rome, and with the booty taken from the Parthians he caused a public library, the first such, to be erected in Rome. Henceforth he retired from public life and devoted himself to literature. He was a patron of Vergil and Horace. When he was governor of Transpadane Gaul he withdrew Vergil's estate from the lands being distributed to the veterans and thus saved it for the poet. Vergil addressed one of his eclogues to him. Of his own works—tragedies, a history of the civil wars of his own day, and speeches—only a few fragments of the speeches are extant.

Pollux (pol'uks). Latin name of Polydeuces. See Dioscuri.

Polybius (pō-lib'i-us). Greek historian; born at Megalopolis, Arcadia, Greece, c204 B.C. He is said to have died as the result of a fall from his horse, c120 B.C. He was a son of Lycortas, who was a general and statesman of the Achaean League and a friend of Philopoemon. For the first half of his life Polybius was occupied with the military and diplomatic work of the League, which he hoped to keep independent. He went to Egypt with his father and Aratus as an ambassador of the League (181 B.C.), and became the commander of the League's cavalry. In the war between the Romans and Perseus of Macedonia his desire was to keep the League neutral, but he was sent as commander of a cavalry troop to the aid of the Romans (169 B.C.). However, the Romans did not avail themselves of the assistance thus offered, and afterward Polybius and the Achaeans were charged with lack of zeal in the Roman cause. With 1000 prominent Achaeans he was taken to Rome as a hostage (166 B.C.) and kept there for 17 years. As a cultivated hostage, as distinct from a captive, he became acquainted with some of the leading men of Rome. Aemilius Paulus, who defeated Perseus (168 B.C.), made him the tutor of his sons Fabius and Scipio Africanus the Younger. He became the friend and adviser of Scipio who (151 B.C.) secured permission for Polybius, and those of his fellow Achaeans who had survived, to return to their homes. After a short stay at home he accompanied Scipio on his campaigns and was with him when Carthage was captured (146 B.C.). In the meantime the Achaean League had risen against Rome and been disastrously defeated; Corinth was destroyed (146 B.C.); the League was prostrate. Polybius returned to his home and used his good reputation with the Romans to win what concessions he could for his defeated countrymen from their conquerors. When Greece became a Roman province he was given the task of organizing it. This he did so honorably from the standpoint of the conquering Romans, and so skillfully as the representative of a conquered people, that both honored him. Statues in his honor, inscribed with laudatory phrases, were raised at Mantinea, Pallantium, Tegea, and Acacesium. The statue at Acacesium bore the words, "Hellas would never have come to grief if she had obeyed Polybius in all things, and, having come to grief, she found succor through him alone." Later Polybius spent much time in Rome and in long journeys to gather material for the completion of his History. This History, which covered in detail the period from 220 to 145 B.C., was in 40 books, of which five survive intact. Parts of the remaining books have been preserved in the works of other Greek and Roman historians, and there are also some fragments extant. Polybius took a philosophical view of history as a means of teaching men, by an investigation of causes and an honest record of facts, how to avoid disaster and improve themselves. To the story of wars that made up a large part of his History he could bring his own wide experience as a general and tactician and as an observer of other generals, notably Scipio. In detailing causes he had his own first-hand knowledge of Roman politics and institutions and of the affairs of Hellas. In furtherance of his desire to present facts he traveled widely, to see for himself the terrain of important battles, and to inspect sites and records; for example, he crossed the Alps himself before he wrote of Hannibal's crossing of them. In addition, he made careful use of official documents. Succeeding generations have honored and read Polybius for his accuracy, his understanding, and his willingness to recognize the skill, organization, and superior political and military institutions of the enemies of his own country.

Polybus (pol'i-bus). In Greek legend, the king of Corinth, husband of Periboea, or Merope, to whom Oedipus was brought as an infant after shepherds had found him on the mountain with his ankles pierced. Polybus brought Oedipus up to believe he was his own son, and it was to avoid fulfillment of the prophecy that he would kill his father that Oedipus left Corinth and went to Thebes. Polybus died peacefully of old age.

Polybus. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan; named by Homer as a son of Antenor and Theano, and a leader of a group of Trojans who assaulted the Greek fortifications in the tenth year of the Trojan War.

Polybotes (pol-i-bō'tēz). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle he fled to Cos. Poseidon pursued him there and broke off a chunk of the island, hurled it at Polybotes and buried him under it. The new island thus formed, became known as Nisyrus.

Polycaste (pol-i-kas'tē). In Greek mythology, the sister of Daedalus. She was the mother of Talos, a gifted smith. Daedalus, jealous of the boy's skill, hurled him from the top of the Acropolis. Polycaste was so grief-stricken over her son's death that she hanged herself and was metamorphosed into a bird. Some say the bird that chattered and laughed while the sorrowing Daedalus later buried the body of his own son Icarus, was Polycaste, delighted to see Daedalus suffer as she had suffered. The Athenians built a sanctuary in honor of Polycaste beside the Acropolis. Polycaste is also sometimes called Perdix.

Polyclitus (pol-i-klī'tus) or Polycleus (-klē'tus). [Sometimes called Polyclitus of Sicyon; also known as Polyclitus the Elder.] Greek sculptor and architect in the last half of the 5th century B.C., an older contemporary of Phidias. He is associated with the high development of abstract proportion which characterizes Greek sculpture. He seems to have realized the athletic type of ideal to the entire satisfaction of the Greek world, and made a figure embodying the accepted proportions, which was called "the canon." This canon is supposed to have been a simple figure carrying a spear (doryphorus), described by Pliny and now represented by several copies. The best of these was found at Pompeii, and is in the museum at Naples. Another statue of almost equal importance is mentioned by Pliny, and called diadumenus (i.e., an athlete binding a fillet about his head). The best copy is in the British Museum. The most important monumental work of Polyclitus was the chryselephantine Hera at Argos, which has completely disappeared; representations of it are found on coins. An Amazon Polyclitus made for Ephesus, also lost, was considered by the ancients to be the equal, if not the superior, of the Amazon of Phidias. In general, Polyclitus worked in bronze, and confined himself to statues of athletic victors.

Polycrates (pō-lik'ra-tēz). He was a son of Aeaces. By an insurrection he made himself master of Samos (q.v.) and was tyrant of the island from c540 to 522 B.C. In the beginning he shared control with his two brothers, but then killed one, banished the other, and made himself sole ruler. He had an alliance of friendship with Amasis, king of Egypt. He built a fleet and waged war throughout the eastern Mediterranean, plundering friend and foe alike on the theory that friends are much more pleased if what has been taken from them is restored than they are to be spared in the first place. Polycrates overcame the Lesbians at sea when they came to the aid of Miletus, and forced his Lesbian captives to dig a vast moat around his palace at Samos. Good fortune attended all his endeavors. He lived in a magnificent style and was a patron of literature and the arts. He enjoyed such great prosperity and good luck that his friend and ally, Amasis of Egypt, became uneasy. He wrote to Polycrates to this effect: The uninterrupted good fortune of Polycrates disturbs him, because he knows that the gods are envious and will bring him down. Amasis is more pleased when the good fortune of his friends is mingled with an occasional setback, for in that way the gods are appeased. He has never known a man whose extreme good luck did not end in calamity. He therefore suggests to Polycrates that, to distract the gods from too close a scrutiny of his prosperity, he take the thing that is dearest to him and cast it away where it can never be found. In this way he will suffer a grievous loss and, in the eyes of the gods, his good fortune will have been tempered. Polycrates read the message from Amasis and found his advice good. He considered which of his treasures it would grieve him most to lose and decided on a signet ring, an emerald set in gold. He put to sea in a 50-oared ship and when he was well out, he hurled the ring into the sea. Then he returned home and grieved for his loss. Shortly thereafter a fisherman caught a splendid fish. It was such a superb specimen that he decided to give it to Polycrates. He took it to the palace and presented it to him. Polycrates was pleased with the gift and asked the fisherman to dine with him. In preparing the fish servants cut it open; within it they found Polycrates' ring. With joy they restored it to their master. Polycrates immediately sent word to Amasis and told him the whole story. Whereupon Amasis concluded that it was not given to man to divert fate from its destined path on his fellow men. He was so certain that Polycrates would end in disaster that he straightway dissolved his alliance of friendship with him, that he might be spared having to grieve over a friend when disaster

inevitably overcame Polycrates. This, at any rate, is the reason that Herodotus gives for the end of the alliance between Polycrates and Amasis. When Cambyses was preparing war against Egypt (c525 B.C.), Polycrates offered him assistance and sent him a number of ships manned with those whom Polycrates thought were the most likely to rebel against his rule. These ships he gave to Cambyses with instructions never to allow the men to return home. However, some of this crew escaped, or deserted, or never got to Egypt at all. They returned to Samos and defeated Polycrates in a sea-fight, but were defeated by him when they attacked him on land. They then appealed to the Spartans for aid against Polycrates. In the meantime Polycrates imprisoned the wives and children of his loyal subjects so that they would not go over to the rebels. He threatened to burn the prisoners if his subjects joined the exiles. The Samian rebels succeeded in gaining the assistance of Sparta. Some say the Spartans agreed to help the Samian exiles out of gratitude. Others say it was to punish Samos for stealing a bowl Croesus had sent them, and an embroidered linen corselet sent them by Amasis. The Corinthians also joined the Samian exiles in their war against Polycrates, to avenge an old insult. The Spartans brought a strong force and attacked Samos. For 40 days they besieged the island. Then, finding they were making no headway, they lifted the siege and sailed away. Polycrates now conceived the ambition to become master of the sea. Oroetes, a Persian who had been made governor of Sardis by Cyrus, aware of Polycrates' ambition and determined to destroy him, sent him a message in which he avowed that Cambyses, Cyrus' successor, was seeking Oroetes' life. He offered Polycrates all his wealth to enable him to become lord of the sea if Polycrates would come to his rescue and carry him away from Sardis. In the meantime, he invited Polycrates to send a trusted messenger to whom he would show all the wealth which he would give to Polycrates. Polycrates sent his messenger. The wily Oroetes filled eight chests with stones, and covered these with a layer of gold. These he showed to the messenger from Polycrates, who in his turn reported to his master. Hearing of this great store of gold, Polycrates, despite many warnings from seers and from his friends, decided to go to Oroetes in person. His daughter dreamed that she saw Polycrates hanging in the air, washed by Zeus and anointed by the sun. Even this dream did not deter him. On the contrary, he threatened to keep his daughter unwed if she did not cease her entreaties to him to remain at home. Accompanied by many friends he sailed off to Oroetes. In Sardis Oroetes set upon him and killed him in a manner which (according to Herodotus who tells these events) was too horrible to describe. Oroetes crucified the dead body of Polycrates, rains sent by Zeus washed it, and the sun's rays anointed it. Thus the dream of Polycrates' daughter was fulfilled. His end also confirmed the gloomy predictions which his friend Amasis of Egypt had entertained concerning the disasters which were certain to befall any man whose good fortune was uninterrupted.

Polydamas (pō-lid'a-mas). In Greek legend, a son of Panthous and Phrontis. He was the brother of Euphorbus and Hyperenor, and was a close friend of Hector. In the Trojan War he showed himself as a daring and courageous fighter, but as an even more courageous and skillful strategist who dared argue with Hector about the conduct of the war. In the attack on the Greek fortifications he advised Hector not to take his horses and chariots through the Greek moat lest the Greeks, in a counterattack, force them back into the narrow moat where there would be no room to maneuver and they would become easy targets for the Greeks. Instead, he advised that they attack on foot. Hector was pleased to follow this advice and the attack was successful. But as they prepared to breach the wall an eagle, clutching a serpent in its talons, flew over. The serpent, still alive and writhing, bit the eagle and the eagle screamed and dropped it to the ground. Polydamas interpreted this to mean that the Trojans, if they attacked the wall now, would miss the prize and many would fail to return, even as the eagle had failed to return with its prey to its nest. He therefore urged Hector to withdraw and regroup his forces. Hector scorned his advice, and accused him of being frightened by the confusion of battle. Polydamas smarted under this rebuke but continued to advise what he thought was sensible and possible. When Achilles had driven the Trojans back simply by appearing unarmed at the ships, Polydamas again advised withdrawal. He said they should withdraw into the city and fight from there, but again his advice was scorned. Later, as Hector stood alone outside the walls he remembered what Polydamas had advised and regretted that he had not followed his counsel. He felt that the approaching defeat was his fault for ignoring Polydamas. After the death of Hector, and later that of Penthesilea, the Trojans withdrew to the city in terror. Polydamas now counseled that they neither flee, as some urged, nor wait the arrival of other help, as others suggested. Rather he advised they should restore Helen with rich gifts to Menelaus. To the accusation of Paris that this was cowardice, Polydamas replied that he preferred wise discretion to foolish valor. His interest was in protecting the city, whereas Paris was bringing ruin to Troy. But the proposal to restore Helen which he had made many times was never carried out. Nor was his final plea to retire and fight from the walls and towers of the city heeded, for each time aid came to the Trojans they sallied out of the city and fought on the plain. Polydamas was probably right in all his advice, but the end result had already been determined by the gods.

Polydamas. A native of Scotussa in Thessaly; active in the latter part of the 5th century B.C. He was said to be the tallest man of his age, and a great athlete who won victories in the pancratium at the games and had his statue at Olympia. Among his legendary feats of strength, it is said: that he slew a lion on Mount Olympus with his bare hands; that he seized a huge and fierce bull by its hind feet and hung on to it despite the creature's leaping and lurchings, until at last the bull escaped, but only by leaving its hind hoofs in the hands of Polydamas; that he stopped a chariot going at full speed by grasping it with one hand. The Persian king heard of his exploits and sent for him. He journeyed to Susa, where he challenged three of the Persian Immortals to fight him at once, and he killed all three. His exploits were inscribed on the pedestal of his statue at Olympia. But at last he perished through his own strength. He went into a cave under a mountain with some companions. When the roof of the cave began to crack his companions fled, but Polydamas, arrogant in his strength, thought he could hold up the roof with his hands. The mountain fell in on him and killed him.

Polydectes (pol-i-dek'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Magnes and a nymph. He was the brother of that Dictys who rescued Perseus and Danaë when they were washed ashore on Seriphus. Polydectes was king of Seriphus. He wanted to marry Danaë, but was prevented from doing so by Perseus. In order to get rid of Perseus, Polydectes sent him to get the head of Medusa, on the pretext that this would be a suitable gift for him to give for his supposed plan to marry Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus. Polydectes was convinced that Perseus would be killed on this errand. While Perseus was away, Polydectes sought Danaë but she fled with Dictys and hid in a temple. When Perseus returned he searched for and found his mother and learned of the treachery of Polydectes. He went to the court and turned Polydectes and his followers to stone by revealing to them the head of Medusa.

Polydeuces (pol-i-dū'sēz). The twin brother of Castor. See Dioscuri.

Polydora (pol-i-dō'ra). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a daughter of Peleus and the half-sister of Achilles. By Spercheus, the river-god, she was the mother of Menesthius. Later she married Borus, who reared Menesthius as his own son.

Polydorus (pol-i-dō'rus). In Greek legend, the youngest son of Priam and Hecuba. During the Trojan War he was sent to Polymnestor, a king in Thrace, for safe-keeping, along with a great store of treasure. Polymnestor betrayed the Trojan allies and went over to Agamemnon. He murdered Polydorus and stole the treasure he had brought with him. After the war, when Aeneas landed in Thrace and attempted to found a city, the blood of Polydorus gushed black from the ground and the voice of Polydorus warned Aeneas not to settle there. The voice further told of Polydorus' murder by Polymnestor and of his anguish because he had not been given honorable burial. Aeneas performed funeral honors for Polydorus, and then, in accordance with his advice, sailed away.

Polydorus. A fleet runner; named in the Iliad as the youngest son of Priam and Laothoë. Priam had forbidden him to take part in the Trojan War, but he defied his father, charged into the battle to show off his great speed, and was slain by Achilles.

Polydorus. In Greek legend, a son of Cadmus and Harmonia. He became king of Thebes when Cadmus left the city to go into exile in Illyria. Polydorus was the father of Labdacus and the ancestor of Oedipus.

Polydorus. In Greek legend, a son of Hippomedon. He was one of the Epigoni who successfully marched against Thebes.

Polydorus. Rhodian sculptor, associate of Agesander in carving the Laocoön group.

Polygnotus (pol-ig-nō'tus). Greek painter, born on the island of Thasus. He was active in Athens c475-447 B.C. He was identified with Cimon in the reconstruction of Athens, and seems to have had about him a large school or force of assistants. In recognition of his merit as an artist he was given Athenian citizenship. He worked on the Painted Portico in Athens, where a picture of The Capture of Troy was attributed to him. In this picture Elpinice, sister of Cimon, appeared as Laodice, daughter of King Priam. Among his other known works was the Marriage of the Dioscuri to the Leucippides in the sanctuary of the Dioscuri at Athens, and very celebrated paintings of the Capture of Troy and the Descent of Odysseus into Hades at Delphi. Polygnotus introduced transparent draperies and many realistic effects; for example, Pausanias tells that a hare in the picture of the marriage of the Dioscuri was greatly admired for its lifelike effect.

Polyhymnia (pol-i-him'ni-ā), or Polymnia (polim'ni-ā). One of the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne. She is the muse of the sublime hymn and also of pantomime and the religious dance. In art she is usually represented in a meditative attitude, heavily draped, and without any attribute. See Muses.

Polyidus (pol-i-ī'dus). In Greek mythology, a seer of Corinth, and a descendant of Melampus. He advised Bellerophon to capture the winged horse Pegasus in order to kill the Chimaera. He was visiting in Crete when Glaucus, young son of King Minos, disappeared and could not be found. On likening a heifer—which changed color from white to red to black—to a mulberry which changes color in the same order as it ripens, Polyidus was informed that, in accordance with instructions from an oracle, he must find Glaucus. He found Glaucus drowned in a vat of honey, and was then told he must restore the drowned child to life. Polyidus, watching by the dead child, saw a serpent glide near the body. He killed it. Presently another serpent approached, and finding its mate dead it slid off and returned with an herb which it laid on the dead serpent's body, whereupon the dead serpent was slowly revived and glided away. Polyidus took the herb and applied it to the corpse of Glaucus. The child too, was restored to life. Polyidus was given rich gifts by Minos, who commanded him to teach the arts of divination to Glaucus. Polyidus did so, but before he left Crete he commanded Glaucus to spit into his open mouth. As soon as Glaucus did so he forgot all Polyidus had taught him. Polyidus prophesied that his own son Euchenor, who was longing to join the Greeks in the Trojan War, would either die in his home, worn out by affliction, or fall at Troy if he accompanied the Greeks. Knowing the alternatives, his son went to Troy, where he perished from one of Paris' arrows.

Polymastus (pol-i-mas'tus). An epithet of Artemis, meaning "Many-breasted." The name came from the image of the goddess ("Diana of the Ephesians") in her magnificent temple at Ephesus. The image had many breasts and bore a mural crown on its head; the figure had no legs but ended in a point, and was decorated with a number of mystical animals. Artemis Polymastus was a fertility goddess, as shown by the many breasts. She was originally an Asiatic divinity, who was adopted by the Greeks as they colonized the region, and to whom they gave the attributes of their own Artemis in Greece.

Polymela (pol-i-mē'lā) or Polymele (-lē). Named by Homer as a daughter of Phylas. She was loved by Hermes and by him had a son, Eudorus, who commanded a battalion of Myrmidons under Patroclus at Troy. After Eudorus was born Polymele was wooed and won by Echeclus, a son of Actor, and Eudorus fat, fâte, fâr, fâre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pîne; not, nôte, môve, nôr, was brought up as his own son by Echeclus. Polymela. In Greek legend, a daughter of Actor. Her father gave her in marriage to Peleus. Informed, falsely, that Peleus intended to desert her for Sterope, daughter of Acastus and Cretheis, she hanged herself.

Polymelus (pol-i-mē'lus). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a Lycian ally of the Trojans. He was slain by Patroclus.

Polymnestor (pol-im-nēs'tor). In Greek legend, a king in Thrace and the husband of Ilione, oldest daughter of Priam. Polydorus, the youngest son of Priam and Hecuba, was sent to Polymnestor with great treasure for safe-keeping during the Trojan War. Polymnestor changed sides and went over to Agamemnon. He murdered Polydorus and stole the treasure. When Hecuba, brought as a captive to Thrace after the war, learned of Polydorus' death—according to some accounts, his body was washed ashore at her feet—she, with other captive Trojan women, blinded Polymnestor and killed his children.

Polynices or Polyneices (pol-i-nī'sēz). In Greek legend, a son of Oedipus and Jocasta. After the withdrawal of Oedipus from Thebes, Polynices and his brother Eteocles agreed to share the throne of Thebes by ruling alternately. Eteocles, the elder, ruled first, but when his term came to an end he refused to relinquish the throne on the grounds of Polynices' violent character, and banished Polynices. He fled to Argos, to the court of King Adrastus. There he fell into a quarrel with Tydeus of Calydon, who had also fled to Argos. Adrastus separated them and, remembering an oracle which told him to yoke his daughters in marriage to a boar and a lion, he gave his daughter Aegia (or Argia) to Polynices, who bore the device of a lion on his shield, and promised to restore him to his lands. Aegia bore Polynices a son, Thersander. Adrastus now proposed to march on Thebes and began to assemble the leaders of the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. Polynices bribed Eriphyle, wife of the seer Amphiaraus, to persuade her husband to accompany the expedition by giving her the necklace of Harmonia which he had brought with him from Thebes. This necklace had been given to Harmonia as a wedding gift by Aphrodite, and had a history of bringing disaster to its possessor. In the war on Thebes, Polynices met Eteocles face to face and in single combat to decide who should have the throne, the brothers killed each other. All the other Argive leaders were slain except Adrastus, who fled on his winged horse Arion. Creon, uncle of Polynices and Eteocles, succeeded to the throne of Thebes. He gave orders that the bodies of the Argive dead should remain unburied. Polynices' body was cast out of the city to become the prey of scavenger birds because he had treacherously attacked his own city. But Antigone, the sister of Polynices, defied Creon's order and gave her brother's body a ritual burial. Creon sentenced her to death for disobeying his order.

Polypemon (pol-i-pē'mon). Another name for Procrustes. He acquired the name Procrustes from his habit of cutting up travelers to make them fit the bed he provided for their night's lodging. He was the father of Sinis, the "Pine-bender." Father and son were slain by Theseus.

Polyphemus (pol-i-fē'mus). In Greek mythology, a one-eyed giant, the chief of the Cyclopes. He was a son of Poseidon and the owner of great flocks and bountiful gardens. He loved Galatea, the daughter of Nereus and Doris, and for love of her tried to tame his wild appearance and gave up his savage ways. But Galatea loved Acis and paid no attention to the songs of love that Polyphemus played to her on his shepherd's pipe, nor to his promises of gifts and honors. When Polyphemus, sighing of love for Galatea, came upon her lying in the arms of Acis, he was enraged. Galatea escaped his wrath, but Acis was crushed under a huge rock hurled at him by Polyphemus.

Telemus, a seer, had warned Polyphemus that one day Odysseus would come and put out his single eye, but Polyphemus scorned the prophecy. When Odysseus, with some of his companions, appeared in his cave, Polyphemus rolled a great stone before the entrance and imprisoned them. Each day thereafter he devoured some of them when he returned from the fields with his sheep, until the wily Odysseus made him drunk and put out his eye with a wooden stake especially sharpened for that purpose. Polyphemus screamed in pain and rage, but when actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; ҃H, then; ɔ as d or j, ʒ as s or sh, ʒ as t or ch, ʒ as z or zh.

his brothers gathered outside the cave and asked who was wounding him he replied, "Noman," for that was the name Odysseus had given him, and his brothers went away. The Greeks escaped the next day by clinging to the bellies of the sheep which Polyphemus let out of the cave to graze. As they fled to the shore and their ship Odysseus could not resist shouting back to Polyphemus and telling him who he really was. Polyphemus recalled the prophecy of Telemus and was chagrined, because he had expected Odysseus, if he ever came, to be a bigger man. As the mocking Greeks sailed off Polyphemus called on his father Poseidon to avenge him; and this was the reason that Poseidon prevented Odysseus from returning to his homeland for such a long time.

Polyphemus. In Greek legend, a son of Elatus of Arcadia. He fought the Lapithae in his youth and in his later years, though his limbs were enfeebled, he kept his martial spirit and joined Jason in the quest for the Golden Fleece. In Mysia, Hylas, Heracles' squire, disappeared. While Polyphemus and Heracles searched for him the Argonauts, after waiting some time, sailed away and left them. Polyphemus founded the city of Crius in Mysia and died in the land of the Chalybes.

Polyphides (pol-i-fī'dēz). In Greek legend, a son of Mantius and a grandson of Melampus the seer. Apollo made Polyphides the best of all seers after Amphiaraus, also a descendant of Melampus, was swallowed up by the earth in the war of the Seven against Thebes. The son of Polyphides was Theoclymenus.

Polyphides. In Greek legend, a king of Sicily. He sheltered Agamemnon and Menelaus in their youth, when they were brought to his court by faithful servants after the murder of Atreus. Later he sent them on to Oeneus of Calydon.

Polyphontes (po-li-fon'tēz). According to tradition, a brother of Cresphontes, king of Messenia. He murdered Cresphontes and two of his sons in a rebellion, and married Merope, Cresphontes' widow. A third son of Cresphontes and Merope had been sent away for safety during the rebellion, and survived, unknown to Polyphontes. He secretly returned to Messenia and announced to Polyphontes that he was the murderer of Cresphontes' third son, Aepytyus. When Merope heard of his coming, and learned that Aepytyus was no longer in the place where she had sent him for safe-keeping, she resolved to kill this self-confessed murderer. But when she went to do so he was revealed to her as her own son Aepytyus, come in disguise to kill Polyphontes. Thereupon Merope and Aepytyus resolved to kill Polyphontes and did so. Others say that Polyphontes was not the brother but the uncle of Cresphontes, and that it was Cresphontes who slew him.

Polyphrasmon (pol'i-fras'mon) or Polyphradmon (-frad'mon). Greek tragic poet, son of Phrynichus; fl. 5th century B.C.; defeated by Aeschylus' Theban tetralogy, 467 B.C.

Polypoetes (pol'i-pō-ē'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Pirithous and Hippodamia. He became king of the Lapiths when Pirithous failed to return from his expedition to the Underworld. In the Trojan War he was a leader of the Greeks and, with Leonteus, he held off Asius of Arisbe when the latter invaded the Greek fortifications with his chariots. Polypoetes slew Astyalus, Damasus, Pylon, and Ormenus. At the funeral games in honor of Patroclus he was the winner in the shotput.

Polypoetes. According to Greek tradition, a son of Apollo and Phthia. He dwelt in the land of the Curetes. Aetolus, son of Endymion, forced to flee from his country, came to the land of the Curetes. There he slew Polypoetes and his brothers Dorus and Laodocus, seized the land, and named it Aetolia for himself.

Polypoetes. According to some accounts, a son of Odysseus and Callidice, queen of Thesprotia. He was born after Odysseus returned from his wanderings following the Trojan War. Odysseus had come to Thesprotia to appease Poseidon, and married Callidice. On the death of Callidice Odysseus turned the kingdom over to Polypoetes and returned to Ithaca.

Polyorthis (po-li-pōr'this). According to some accounts, a son of Odysseus and Penelope, born after Odysseus returned from his long wanderings following the Trojan War.

Polysperchon (pol-i-spēr'kon) or Polyperchon (pol-i-pēr'kon). Macedonian general in the service of Alexander the Great; born c380 B.C.; died after 303 B.C. He succeeded Antipater as regent in 319 B.C. He was superseded by Cassander, son of Antipater. Polytechnus (pol-i-tek'nus). In Greek mythology, the father by Aëdon of Itys. Much the same story is told of Polytechnus and Aëdon as that concerning Tereus and Procne, with some variations. According to this story, Polytechnus and Aëdon were punished for boasting that their love was greater than that of Zeus and Hera. They were forced to compete with each other on the understanding that the loser would present the winner with a slave. Polytechnus, who lost, went to bring Aëdon's sister, Chelidon, back with him. On the way he violated her and threatened her with death if she revealed his act. To punish him the sisters killed Itys and served him to his father at a feast. When Polytechnus, horrified at this deed, pursued them, he was captured by his wife's servants, bound, smeared with honey, and left to be eaten alive by ants. Aëdon would have released him but her brothers forbade it, and Zeus changed him into a woodpecker, Aëdon into a nightingale, and Chelidon into a swallow. In a quite different story, Aëdon is given as the wife of Zethus, and her child is called Itylus. See Aëdon.

Polyxena (pō-lik'sē-nā). In Greek legend, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba. Achilles saw her, either in the temple of Apollo or on the walls of Troy at the time of the ransoming of Hector's body, and fell in love with her. He tried by secret negotiations to persuade either Hector or Priam to give her to him, but the price demanded was too high and involved either treachery (Hector), or abandoning Helen to the Trojans (Priam). As he was dying from Paris' wound Achilles is said to have requested that Polyxena be sacrificed on his barrow, and after the fall of Troy the shade of Achilles appeared to Neoptolemus, his son, in a dream, and warned that he would send high winds to prevent the Greeks from sailing for home if Polyxena was not sacrificed to appease his shade. Calchas, the seer, confirmed that only the death of Polyxena would bring favorable winds. Agamemnon was unwilling to shed more blood but he was ultimately persuaded by Odysseus to agree to the sacrifice, and a herald was sent to fetch Polyxena from her mother's side. She accompanied the herald willingly as she had, she said, nothing to live for except dishonor and slavery. She bared her throat to the sacrificial knife with such courage that even the Greeks were overawed and gave her honorable burial. After her death, the storm winds were stilled and a favorable breeze permitted the Greeks to sail. Some say the sacrifice of Polyxena occurred at Troy. Others say it took place after the Greeks and their captives had already left Troy and landed in Thrace. Other accounts say that Polyxena had fallen in love with Achilles, and had run away from Troy to join him in the Greek camp, and killed herself at his death. She was the subject of a lost tragedy by Sophocles, and of the tragedies Hecuba by Euripides and Troades by Seneca, but she is not mentioned by Homer.

Polyxenus (pō-lik'sē-nus). In Greek legend, a son of Agasthenes and grandson of Augeas, king in Elis. In command of ten Elean ships he accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan War from which he returned safely. He had a son Amphinachus, named for his friend who was slain at Troy. Amphinachus was the father of Eleus, during whose reign the Dorians gathered under the sons of Aristomachus for the return to the Peloponnesus.

Polyxo (pō-lik'sō). In Greek legend, an aged nurse of Hypsipyle, queen of Lemnos. The Lemnian women had killed all the men of the island and Polyxo urged Hypsipyle to welcome the Argonauts when they asked to land at Lemnos on their way to Colchis. She advised Hypsipyle to invite them to stay so that they should become protectors of the island and father sons by the Lemnian women to prevent the race from dying out.

Polyxo. In Greek legend, a native of Argos who married Tlepolemus, son of Heracles. According to some accounts, Helen fled to her home in Rhodes after the death of Menelaus, but Polyxo, a former friend, caused her to be hanged to avenge the death of Tlepolemus in the Trojan War.

Polyzelus (pol-i-zē'lus). Brother of Gelon, tyrant of Gela and Syracuse; fl. in the early part of the 5th century B.C. He succeeded Gelon as general of the Syracusan army and tyrant of Syracuse. He sent his race horses and chariots to compete in the Olympic and Pythian games, as did other tyrants of Sicily. A fragmentary inscription found at Delphi, in association with fragments of the monumental four-horse chariot group of which the famous bronze Charioteer is the principal surviving piece, suggests that Polyzelus may have been the dedicant.

Pometia (pō-mē'shi-ā) or Pometii (-ī). A city of the Volsci in S Latium. It was a nameless site when Aeneas visited his father in the Underworld. Anchises pointed out to him the shade of the man waiting to be born who would found the city. The Volscian town became a Roman colony in 382 B.C. In ancient times the city was also called Suessa Pometia, perhaps the modern Torre Petrarà, or Mesa.

Pomoerium or Pomerium (pō-mē'ri-um). Explained as pro-moerium, the term appears originally to have signified a sacred zone outside, or outside and inside, the walls of a fortified Italic town. In such a zone the erection of buildings was prohibited, in order to keep the space clear for the movement of troops in defense, and to deny an attacker possible access to the battlements via the roofs. Roman writers tell of an obviously very old ritual in which the limit of the pomerium was marked by a furrow made by a bronze plow to which were yoked a bull and a cow. The sod turned over by the plow symbolized the earthen mound of the agger, while the trench cut by the plow represented the fossa or ditch at the foot of the agger. This is one form of magic circle; the Romans believed they had inherited the ritual from the Etruscans. Magic or apotropaic circles are, however, widely familiar in ancient Italy, Greece, and Indo-European contexts generally; they are no monopoly of the Etruscans, and the practice may well have been Italic. In the legendary founding of Rome, Romulus cut a furrow in this manner. When Remus leaped over it in mockery, his act constituted a desecration for which Romulus killed him. At some colonies, the limit of the pomerial zone was apparently fixed by streets. The excavators of Ostia and Minturnae believe that they have identified such streets, parallel to the city walls at a distance of some 40-60 feet from them. In classical Rome, the pomerium marked the official boundary of the ritually consecrated city, purified by regular lustrations, within which certain activities were prohibited. Since the growing populace repeatedly built out beyond this boundary, there were successive proposals to extend the pomerium so as to bring new residential areas within its protection. In this connection, we hear of such enlargements of the boundaries by Sulla, Caesar, Augustus, Claudius, Vespasian, Hadrian, and Aurelian; the details concerning these enlargements are, however, clouded in scholarly controversies not yet resolved. Pomona (pō-mō'nā). In Roman mythology, the protecting goddess of fruit trees; a wood-nymph devoted to their cultivation. Her delight was in pruning and grafting them, and so great was her devotion to her orchards that she refused to have anything to do with the many suitors who wooed her. Silenus, Priapus, the followers of Pan, and the satyrs tried to win her, but she fenced herself in in her orchards and refused their suits. Vertumnus, god of gardens and orchards, fell in love with her. He attempted to win her by adopting various disguises. At last he appeared to her in his own glowing beauty and received her happy consent to share her orchards with him.

Pompeia (pom-pē'ā). Second wife of Julius Caesar, and a granddaughter of Sulla. Her marriage to Caesar, which took place in 67 B.C., was terminated in 61 B.C. She was charged with misconduct during the ceremonies of the Bona Dea. These rites were extremely sacred, and men were rigorously excluded from them. During one performance of the rites, a male intruder dressed in woman's clothing was detected in the house. He was found to be Publius Clodius, a notorious scoundrel reputed to be the lover of Pompeia. This was a colossal scandal and it was charged that Pompeia had arranged or connived at his presence there. Neither the charge of impiety nor of infidelity with Clodius was ever proved. This being so, it was asked of Caesar why he divorced her. The future master of Rome answered that "Caesar's wife must be above suspicion."

Pompeii (pom-pā'ē). Ancient city in Italy, situated on the Bay of Naples 13 miles SE of Naples, nearly at the foot of Mount Vesuvius. It was a flourishing provincial town,

containing many villas. It was severely injured (63 A.D.) by an earthquake, and was totally destroyed (79) by an eruption of Vesuvius. Owing to the preservation of the ruins practically intact to the present day by the layer of ashes and pumice that buried them, the remains of Pompeii afford in many ways the most complete information we possess of Roman material civilization. Some excavations were made on the site in antiquity, in the effort to recover buried treasure, but Pompeii and its tragic end were soon forgotten. In 1748 some peasants came accidentally upon a few ancient works of art in a ruined house, and the Bourbon sovereigns of Naples thereupon caused searches to be made for similar objects. Between 1808 and 1815 Joachim Murat instituted the first scientifically conducted excavations. After his fall the work went on more or less irregularly until the Bourbon kingdom ended in 1860. It thereafter progressed with system and regularity under Giuseppe Fiorelli. Most of the oval area included within the walls has now been thoroughly explored. Excavators have now uncovered about two-fifths of the city which in 79 had an area of about 160 acres. The great theater, of the time of Augustus, is one of the most perfect of Roman antiquity, semicircular in plan, with a diameter of 322 feet. The temple of Isis is a small Corinthian tetrastyle prostyle structure raised on a basement in a peristyle court upon which open the lodgings of the priests. Many interesting objects connected with the cult were found here, and skeletons of the priests amid surroundings indicating that they had sought, too late, to flee. The so-called House of Castor and Pollux is curious as being a double house with a large peristyle court common to the two parts. Each part has its atrium and all its subdivisions complete. The exterior contrasts with the usual plainness by its stucco decoration in panels and arabesques. The so-called House of Marcus Lucretius is a double house, remarkable also for having had three stories, and for its beautiful reception room (tablinum) and dining room. The so-called House of Meleager is notable for its paintings and other decorations. In the atrium there is a marble table supported by winged griffins. The peristyle court, with 24 Ionic columns, is the finest in Pompeii. The so-called House of Pansa is one of the largest and most elaborate dwellings of Pompeii, measuring 120 by 300 feet. The so-called House of the Faun is perhaps the best in style of the ancient city. The usual wall paintings are here replaced by mosaics. The famous Dancing Faun and the mosaic of the Battle of Issus came from this house.

Pompeius Magnus (pom-pā'us mag'nus), Cnaeus. Roman general, elder son of Pompey the triumvir; put to death, 45 B.C. After the defeat of his father at Pharsalus (48 B.C.) by Caesar, Cnaeus Pompeius joined his brother Sextus in Spain. The brothers were defeated by Caesar at Munda, in Spain, 45 B.C. Cnaeus escaped but was captured shortly afterward and put to death.

Pompeius Magnus, Sextus. [English, Pompey; called Pompey the Younger.] Roman soldier; younger son of Pompey (Cnaeus Pompeius) the Great; born 75' B.C.; killed at Miletus, 35 B.C. His forces were defeated by Julius Caesar at Munda in 45 B.C. He became powerful as commander of a fleet on the coasts of Sicily and Italy, and by cutting off Rome's grain supply from Africa, hoped to starve the Romans into receiving him again. He was defeated in a naval battle by Agrippa in 36 B.C., and fled to Asia Minor, where he was captured and executed.

Pompey (pom'pi). [Called Pompey the Great; full Latin name, Cnaeus Pompeius Magnus.] Roman general, born 106 B.C.; murdered in Egypt, Sept. 28, 48 B.C. He was the son of Cnaeus Pompeius Strabo, a Roman general, under whom he served (89 B.C.) in the Social War. As a youth Pompey was noted for his temperate manner of living, for his skill in war, his honorable character, and his availability to those who sought his favors. Strabo was hated for his avarice, and his soldiers mutinied against him, but such was the respect and affection they had for Pompey that he was able to persuade them to return to their general. After his father Strabo died he was accused of misappropriation of the public funds. Pompey defended him so brilliantly that the praetor in charge of the case offered him his daughter Antistia in marriage. Lucius Cornelius Cinna, a leader of the popular party, supporter of Marius and opponent of Sulla, seized control of

Rome during Sulla's absence. He was slain in 84 B.C. and was succeeded by Carbo, another leader of the popular party. Pompey resolved to join the conservative party of Sulla, but not before he had collected an army. In a short time he had gathered three legions with all their equipment in Picenum, forced the followers of Carbo to give way, and defeated a combined force of three generals sent against him (83 B.C.). When he at last met Sulla he arrived as a young general of proven abilities. Sulla greeted him as Imperator and, wishing to reward him, persuaded him to divorce Antistia and to marry a connection of his, one Aemilia, who was at the time married and about to bear a child. Pompey divorced Antistia and married Aemilia, who subsequently died in childbirth. Pompey now went to Sicily and successfully cleared the island of Sulla's Marian enemies. Carbo was seized on the island of Pantelleria, dragged before a tribunal in chains, and condemned to death. From Sicily Pompey crossed over to Africa where, within 40 days, he had conquered the followers of Marius, subdued Numidia, and once more made the name of Rome respected in Africa. When he returned to Rome (81 B.C.), Sulla came to greet him and gave him the title Magnus (Great), which Pompey kept and handed down to his sons. However, Sulla opposed Pompey's demand for a triumph because, he said, the laws did not permit a triumph to one who had been neither praetor nor consul, and moreover, Pompey was too young—24—to be a senator and was still a knight. Pompey pointedly remarked that "more [people] worship the rising than the setting sun," and when Sulla saw how popular he was he allowed him his triumph, regardless of the laws. Pompey's obvious popularity and power soon made Sulla uneasy, and relations between them became less warm. After Sulla's death (78 B.C.), Marcus Aemilius Lepidus (father of the triumvir) sought to change Sulla's constitution, gathered an army, and made himself master of Cisalpine Gaul and part of Italy. Pompey was named general, and with the consul Caius Lutatius Catulus he marched against Lepidus. He went to Mutina, where Marcus Junius Brutus (father of Caesar's chief assassin) commanded the forces of Lepidus and compelled his surrender. Brutus was permitted to retire, but after he had withdrawn Pompey treacherously sent men after him to slay him (c77 B.C.). Lepidus was driven out of Italy. Pompey next had himself named proconsul and went to Spain to help Metellus Pius in the war against Sertorius. He was in Spain from 76 to 71 B.C. and, after the death of Sertorius, defeated his successor Perpenna and ended the war. He returned to Rome at the time of the revolt of Spartacus, the so-called Servile War, and went to assist Crassus. Crassus defeated the main body of the forces of Spartacus (71 B.C.), but Pompey, marching up, came upon those fleeing after the defeat by Crassus and wiped them out and received much of the credit for ending the Servile War. He demanded a triumph for his victories in Spain and asked permission to stand for the consulship. The Senate opposed him because he had not held the required offices, but he joined with Crassus, and since each had an army poised at the gates of Rome the Senate withdrew its opposition. He had his triumph, his second, and became consul with Crassus (70 B.C.). During their term, in which they publicly disagreed, the tribunes and censors were restored, and the Senate was compelled to share the administration of justice with the knights.

While Rome had been preoccupied with wars and civil wars, the pirates who ever infested the Mediterranean had become increasingly powerful and bold. They had 1000 ships, had taken 400 cities, plundered temples, and so interfered with the grain supply on which Rome depended that the city was in great distress. Gabinus, a friend of Pompey, proposed a decree by which Pompey was to be given enormous power for the purpose of clearing the seas of the pirates. When the decree was read there were many who saw the dangers in the great power it would give to one man and they opposed it. But the Gabinian Law was passed (67 B.C.), and Pompey was granted power to take what money he needed, to equip a large fleet, and to enroll crews and fighters at his discretion. In three months he drove the pirates from the sea. He took 20,000 prisoners, most of whom were humanely allowed to settle in small towns in Cilicia and Greece. To reward him, Manilius proposed that the provinces of Lucullus, other territory, and command of the Mithridatic War be given to him. This law was also opposed by some senators. Catulus, renowned for honor and virtue, spoke against it as he had against the Gabinian Law. Cicero supported it, for reasons of personal policy. The law was passed (66 B.C.), and its effect, in conjunction with the Gabinian Law, was to give Pompey unlimited power on land and sea. Opponents of the law were well aware of its effect. "We have at last then, a sovereign," they said, "The Republic is changed into a monarchy." Having received command of the war against Mithridates, thus publicly humiliating Lucullus and denying the services he had already rendered, Pompey set out for the East. He defeated Mithridates at the Euphrates, but Mithridates escaped. Tigranes, king of Armenia, surrendered to Pompey, who fined him 6000 talents and restored certain of his lands. Pompey surged through the East with his army, defeated the Iberians, went into Colchis, marched back to quell a revolt of the Albanians, converted Syria into a Roman province (64 B.C.), reduced Judaea (63 B.C.), founded cities, administered justice, settled disputes between cities, and with imperial power restored order. As he was returning to Rome after his splendid victories he learned what all Rome knew: that his third wife, Mucia, had betrayed him with Caesar. He called Caesar "my Aegisthus," and sent Mucia a divorce. When he later married Caesar's daughter Julia (59 B.C.) he was heavily criticized. On his arrival in Rome he voluntarily disbanded his army. The triumph he was awarded (61 B.C.) for the conquest of Asia was the most magnificent Rome had ever seen. This was the apex of his career. From this time, as Plutarch says, "he was insensibly ruined by the weight of his own power." He had as little talent for politics as he had greatness as a general and soon frittered away the great popularity he had won. He turned away from the conservative party and allied himself with Publius Clodius, a renegade patrician, at whose demand he abandoned his old friend Cicero. He allowed Caesar to reconcile him with Crassus, formed with them the First Triumvirate (60 B.C.), and filled the city with his loyal soldiers to secure the command of Gaul for Caesar for five years. But he could not control the street mobs of Clodius, who openly scorned him, and he had lost the respect of the Senate when he abandoned Cicero. He secured the restoration of Cicero, who reconciled him with the Senate, and then was given the task of supplying Rome with grain. In this position he was again master at Rome, and he carried out his task with great success. Meantime, Caesar was tremendously successful in Gaul, and was intriguing against Pompey. He crossed the Alps and wintered at Luca. Pompey and Crassus met him there (56 B.C.), renewed the triumvirate, agreed to seek the consulship again, and to procure another five-year term for Caesar in Gaul. By means of bribery and street mobs, Crassus and Pompey won the consulship (55 B.C.) and Caesar got his command in Gaul. In the division of the provinces between the consuls, Pompey took Africa and Spain; Crassus got Syria and command of a war against the Parthians. Pompey did not set out for his provinces. He was severely criticized for jaunting about Italy with his young wife, Julia, and leaving the administration of his territories to his lieutenants. Crassus was killed in his war with the Parthians (53 B.C.), and the year before that Julia had died. The links, always fragile, between Caesar and Pompey were now broken, and their rivalry for control of Rome came out in the open. The city was in a ferment. It was proposed that Pompey be made dictator, but Cato successfully opposed this. However, the disorder was so great that Cato later endorsed the proposal that he be named sole consul, and this was done (52 B.C.). In the midst of the political confusion Pompey married Cornelia, the widow of Crassus' son, and allied himself to the conservative party. He served as sole consul for five years, and in this time restored order and embarked on a policy of legislation designed to curb Caesar. He felt so secure in his power that he scorned Caesar and refused to gather an army against him. Caesar's agents circulated freely in Rome, armed with booty that they liberally distributed in bribes to win opponents of Pompey. When at last Caesar crossed the Alps with an army Pompey had no force with which to oppose him. Before he could collect one he learned that Caesar had crossed the Rubicon. Pompey hesitated, bewildered by the sudden collapse of his influence, and unable to decide on any of the conflicting plans offered him. Italy was in a ferment; Rome was in a state of wildest confusion. Those outside the city flocked in, while those in it were making all haste to leave. As the uncertainty and confusion reached a climax, Pompey declared that he would consider all who stayed in Rome as enemies. With many prominent men he left the city to Caesar, and when the latter pursued him he took ship at Brundisium and sailed to Macedonia. Caesar was now master of Italy, but Pompey still controlled the sea. Many eminent men, looking to him to save the Republic, joined him; among them was the consul Labienus, who had been greatly honored by Caesar, and Marcus Junius Brutus, whose father Pompey had caused to be murdered, as well as Cicero. Caesar did not follow him immediately. First he went to Spain, conquered Pompey's troops there, and added them to his own army. Then he went to Macedonia and asked Pompey for a conference. Pompey refused to meet him, seized all the ports, and cut off Caesar's supplies, forcing him to withdraw to Thessaly. Pompey's plan, a sound one, was to exhaust Caesar, but his followers were eager to give battle. They claimed Caesar's withdrawal to Thessaly was a sign of weakness, and urged Pompey to return to Rome. He did not want to appear to flee before Caesar a second time (as he had at Brundisium), and hoped to defeat him in Thessaly. He yielded to the demands of his subordinates, for nothing that had happened in his life had prepared him to accept the abuse and criticism they now heaped on him for refusing to fight. A council of war was held at Pharsalus, in Thessaly, at which it was decided to engage Caesar. Caesar was relieved, "At last," he said, "we shall fight men and not famine." In the battle that followed on Aug. 9, 48 B.C., Pompey, with a force of 45,000 legionaries and 7000 cavalry, was utterly routed by Caesar, with 22,000 legionaries and 1000 cavalry.

For the first time in his life Pompey knew what it was to be defeated and to flee. In a small boat he went to Mytilene to fetch his wife Cornelia and his son. He sailed to Egypt and sent to the young king, Ptolemy XIII, to ask for asylum. Ptolemy's advisers persuaded him to kill Pompey, some say, for "dead men don't bite." Pompey was waiting in his boat off shore for the king's decision. A few men came to him in a small and humble boat. He suspected from their lack of ceremony and the insignificance of their equipage that Ptolemy did not mean to welcome him with honor. Nevertheless, he got into their boat. When they neared the beach his freedman Philip leaped out to help him ashore. He stretched out his hand to Philip, and as he did so was stabbed in the back. Some say it was one of his former centurions who killed him for Ptolemy. Others in the boat set on him and killed him with many blows. They cut off his head, stripped his body, and left it naked on the shore. Philip washed it in sea water, wrapped it in one of his own garments and, using an abandoned fishing boat as a pyre, burned it. When Caesar reached Egypt and learned of his murder he ordered the assassins executed; the ashes of his fallen rival were restored to Cornelia, who buried them on his estate near Alba.

Pomponius, Publius. [Called Secundus.] Roman tragedian of the 1st century A.D. to near Velitrae. From ancient times it had been a notoriously malarial swampland, due to a lack of natural drainage, and from 160 B.C. many attempts were made to drain it, notably those by Cethegus and Trajan. The area, finally drained and improved in the 1920's and 1930's is traversed by the Appian Way.

Pontus (pon'tus). In Greek religion, a personification of the sea. He is variously mentioned as both son and consort of Gaea, 'the earth goddess, and as the father of Nereus, Ceto, Phorcys, and others.

Pontus. In ancient geography, a country in Asia Minor. It was bounded by the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea) on the N, Colchis on the E, Armenia on the SE and S, Cappadocia on the S, Galatia on the SW, and Paphlagonia on the W. It became independent of Persia in the 4th century B.C., and rose to great power with extended boundaries under Mithridates VI. After the victories of Pompey (66 B.C.) it was reduced to its former limits, and was eventually made a Roman province.

Pontus Euxinus (ūk-sī'nus). [Latin form of the Greek name of the Euxine Sea, or Black Sea.] The Greek word euxēinos may be translated "friendly to strangers." The Black Sea having been notably treacherous to Greek mariners with their keelless ships, the legend arose that it had once been called the Axeinos, "hostile to strangers." It was said that its name had been changed in the hope of placating its spirit, as the Greeks were said to have changed the name of the Erinyes (Furies) to Eumenides "the Kindly-Disposed." (JJ)

Popilian Way (pō-pil'i-an). See Via Popilia.

Poppaea Sabina (po-pē'a sa-bī'nā). Wife of Otho, and mistress, and subsequently wife, of Nero. She was divorced from the former and married the latter in 62 A.D. She is usually blamed as the person who chiefly influenced Nero in his murder of his wife Octavia, her sister Antonia, his mother Agrippina, the philosopher Seneca, and others. He is said to have kicked her so severely, in a fit of rage, that she died (65 A.D.).

Populonia (po-pū-lō'nī-a). In ancient geography, a town of the Etruscans, situated on the coast of Etruria on the N end of a promontory projecting into the Mediterranean Sea and opposite the island of Elba. According to the Aeneid it was one of the Etruscan towns that lent assistance to Aeneas in his war with the Latins. Sulla took the town by siege about the beginning of the 1st century B.C., and thereafter it declined. Tombs dating from the 9th century B.C. have been found near the site of the ancient town.

With other Giants, he was buried under volcanic mountains when the gods, aided by Heracles, won the battle.

Porus (pō'rus). Indian king who governed the land between the Hydaspes and Acesines rivers (in what is now the northern Punjab); killed c318 B.C. When Alexander the Great advanced to the Hydaspes River (326 B.C.), some of the reigning princes of the lands through which he passed voluntarily submitted to him and kept much of their powers. Porus, a powerful prince, prepared to resist and gathered an army on the farther bank of the Hydaspes to prevent Alexander from crossing it. His most formidable weapon was a large corps of elephants, the sight and smell of which drove Alexander's horses into a frenzy. The river was swollen by seasonal rains and for a time the two armies faced each other from opposite banks. Alexander made many feints, as if to put his army in motion, but in the end he marched 16 miles up the river with part of his army, crossed, and attacked Porus from his own side. Porus, mounted on a magnificent elephant, was in the thick of the fighting, and was wounded. His elephants, so formidable when met head on, were maddened by attacks from all sides, threw their riders in many cases, and raged about trampling friend and foe alike. According to Plutarch, Porus' own elephant maneuvered him tenderly through the strife, and when it felt Porus weakened by arrow wounds, the elephant knelt down for Porus to dismount and plucked the arrow from his body with its trunk. When Porus saw his army routed he did not flee, but turned his elephant and rode off. Messengers from Alexander persuaded him to return. Alexander asked him how he expected to be treated. Porus replied, "Like a king." He was. Alexander treated him royally and gave him back his kingdom, somewhat enlarged in area, which he was to govern as a dependent of Macedonia. After the death of Alexander, Porus was treacherously slain (c318 B.C.) by the Macedonian general Eudemus.

Poseideon (pō-sī'dē-on). The sixth month of the Attic year, corresponding to the latter half of December and the first half of January.

Poseidon (pō-sī'dōn). One of the 12 Olympian gods, son of Cronus and Rhea, brother of Zeus and Hades. He was lord of the sea and navigation. The Arcadians say that when Rhea bore Poseidon she laid him in a flock of lambs in Arcadia to save him from Cronus, and gave Cronus a foal to swallow in his stead. A spring near Mantinea called "the Lamb" was named by the Arcadians as the place near which Poseidon was hidden. Some say he was brought up by the Telchines of Rhodes, who forged the trident with which he cleft rocks, caused fountains and springs to gush forth, and raked the sea into mighty storms. But the general account is that Poseidon, like his brothers and sisters before him, was swallowed up by his father Cronus as soon as he was born. Zeus tricked Cronus into disgorging the children he had swallowed, and the brothers immediately plotted to dethrone their father. The Cyclopes provided them with weapons, giving the trident to Poseidon, and they waged war on the Titans, of whom Atlas was the leader since Cronus had become too feeble for the role. The Titans were defeated; Cronus was overthrown and fled. Zeus, Hades, and Poseidon cast lots in a helmet to divide up the universe among them. Poseidon drew the sea as his realm. Zeus drew the heavens, and Hades drew the underworld; earth and Olympus were shared by all. Poseidon built an underwater palace for himself near Aegae, in Euboea. In its stables he kept his white chariot horses with bronze hoofs and golden manes, and a golden chariot. Clad in a robe of gold he rode the sea in this equipage, accompanied by sporting dolphins, tritons, and other sea creatures. At his approach storms were dispelled, the waves flattened, and the sea smiled. At first Zeus, Hades, and Poseidon were equal in power, but gradually Zeus came to be the acknowledged master of them all. He was so overbearing that the gods and goddesses on Olympus revolted and bound him as he slept. Through the intervention of the Nereid Thetis, Zeus was freed by Briareus. Enraged at their rebellion, Zeus punished the gods. He sent Poseidon and Apollo as servants to King Laomedon of Troy, who commanded them to build a wall about his city. Some say Poseidon and Apollo were assisted in their task by Aeacus, a son of Zeus, because if the wall was built by the gods alone it would have been invulnerable. When the wall was finished, Laomedon refused to pay Poseidon and Apollo as he had promised. On the contrary, he threatened to cut off their ears and send them off in chains. Poseidon sent a sea-monster to scourge Laomedon's country, and would not recall it until Laomedon agreed to sacrifice his daughter Hesione to it. Laomedon exposed Hesione on a rock for the monster, but Heracles came along and slew it, and gave Hesione to his friend Telamon.

Poseidon was ever seeking to increase his realm, trying as he could to encroach on the land and add it to his sea kingdom. He contended with Athena for control of Athens. He struck the rock of the Acropolis with his trident and caused a fountain of sea water to gush forth. Athena planted an olive tree as her gift to the city and claimed the city for herself. Poseidon challenged her to single combat, and she accepted. However, Zeus forbade them to fight, and ordered their dispute submitted to the gods and goddesses for settlement. All the gods voted in favor of Poseidon and the goddesses voted in favor of Athena, and since Zeus had refused to take part, Athena won by one vote and claimed the city. Poseidon was so enraged he sent a flood over the Thriasian plain. In the end he was reconciled to Athena, and shared her temple, the Erechtheum, on the Acropolis. In his part of the temple the well of sea water he had caused to spring forth was housed, and whenever the south wind blew a sound of the sea could be heard coming from it. He contended with Hera for control of Argolis. Their dispute was submitted to the river-gods Cephissus, Inachus, and Asterion. The river-gods awarded the land to Hera. This time Poseidon, since, some say, he had promised to send no more floods, dried up the rivers, so that ever after their beds were dry in summer. Danaus came into the land with his 50 daughters and urged them to find some way to propitiate Poseidon. Amymone, one of his daughters, was seized by a satyr one day while hunting. Poseidon, hearing her cries, came to her rescue and hurled his trident at the satyr. The satyr dodged and the trident pierced a rock from which a spring immediately gushed forth. Poseidon fell in love with Amymone and embraced her. She bore him a son, Nauplius, and Poseidon promised that the spring his trident had brought forth would never fail. As the fountain of Amymone, it is the source of the Lerna River, which does not dry up in the summer. But some say Poseidon, in this contest with Hera for Argolis, inundated Argos, and was finally persuaded by Hera to withdraw the waters, and that because of the flooding he was called Prosclystius (Flooder). The Argives raised a sanctuary to Poseidon Prosclystius at the point in Argos where the flood ebbed. And some say he sent brine to kill the roots and seeds in the land about Hermione, but when he was propitiated by sacrifices and prayers he stopped sending the brine and the plants grew and the land prospered. For this reason he was called Phytalmios (Nourishing). Poseidon vied with Helios for control of Corinthia, and was awarded the isthmus by Briareus. The land became sacred to him and altars of Isthmian Poseidon were raised. In a second contest with Athena, he claimed Troezen. Zeus ordered them to share control, and the Troezenians worshiped him as "King." He even claimed Aegina, an island belonging to Zeus, and Naxos, the island of Dionysus, but his claim in each case was useless.

Poseidon and Zeus were rivals for the love of the Nereid Thetis, but when they learned from an oracle that she would bear a son greater than his father, they both lost interest in her. Poseidon then courted Amphitrite, another Nereid. She fled, and he sent Delphinus as ambassador to plead his cause. Delphinus was successful and Amphitrite agreed to marry Poseidon. As a reward, Poseidon set the image of Delphinus among the stars as the constellation of the Dolphin. Amphitrite bore Triton, Rhode, and Benthescyme to Poseidon. He was a very inconstant husband and had nearly as many love affairs as Zeus. When Amphitrite learned of his love for the sea-nymph Scylla, she transformed the unfortunate nymph into a monster with six hideous dogs' heads, and 12 long arms. Poseidon also wooed Medusa, once a beautiful maiden, but because he made love to her in one of Athena's temples the goddess transformed her into a hideous snaky-haired Gorgon. When Perseus cut off Medusa's head, the monster Chrysaor and the winged horse Pegasus sprang from her spilled blood; these were her children by Poseidon. He carried off Tyro, daughter of Salmoneus, and, hidden by a huge violet sea wave, ravished her. She bore him Pelias and Neleus. By Libya, a daughter of Epaphus and a granddaughter of Zeus, he was the father of the Phoenician kings Agenor and Belus. He seduced Alope, daughter of King Cercyon of Arcadia. She bore him a son, Hippothous. When Alope died he transformed her into a spring. The nymph Caenis was seized and embraced by him, and he promised to fulfill whatever wish she might ask. She asked to be transformed into an invulnerable man. He carried out his promise, and as a man she was named Caeneus. Aethra, daughter of King Pittheus of Troezen, having been embraced by Aegeus, king of Athens, was ordered in a dream to wade across to the island of Sphaeria and make an offering in the temple there. While she was there Poseidon came upon her and ravished her. For this reason, some say that he was the father of Theseus. Most say Aegeus was his father, but Poseidon many times came to his aid, and promised to fulfill any three wishes Theseus might ask of him. Theseus used one of his wishes to request the destruction of his own son Hippolytus, who he thought had betrayed him with his wife Phaedra. Poseidon sent a great sea-monster, riding the crest of a huge wave, to frighten the horses drawing the chariot of Hippolytus. The horses bolted, overturned the chariot, and dragged Hippolytus to his death. By Gaea Poseidon was the father of Antaeus, king in Libya, whose strength increased as his body had contact with the earth. Antaeus forced strangers to wrestle with him, and when he had slain them he used their skulls to build a temple to his father Poseidon. Antaeus was slain by Heracles. Amycus, king of the Bebryces; Cycnus who was transformed into a swan; Busiris, king of Egypt; Orion whose image was placed among the stars; the Argonauts Ancaeus and Euphemus; Halirrhothius, slain by Ares, and Eumolpus, priest of Eleusis slain by Erechtheus, were among his many sons. He won Aphrodite's gratitude by offering to pay off her marriage gifts to Hephaestus when she had been discovered with Ares. She bore him Rhodus and Herophilus. He pursued Demeter who was desperately searching for her lost daughter Persephone. Demeter sought to escape by transforming herself into a mare. Poseidon changed himself to a stallion and ravished her. She bore him the marvelous horse Arion and Despoena, a nymph. Some say it was because he transformed himself into a stallion on this occasion that he had the epithet Hippios (Horse). At the foot of Mount Alesium in Arcadia, Agamemes and Trophonius built a sanctuary of Poseidon Hippios from oak logs. Some say that a sea wave rose up in the sanctuary. Odysseus dedicated an image of Poseidon Hippios at Pheneüs in Arcadia, and there was an altar of Poseidon Hippios at Olympia. He was especially worshiped by this name in Attica, perhaps because, as some say, he created the horse by striking the rock of the Acropolis with his trident. Some say Poseidon was the father of Athena, and a blue-eyed statue of the goddess in Athens was taken as evidence of his paternity.

In the Trojan War, Poseidon aided the Greeks whenever possible. At one time he disguised himself as the seer Calchas in order to talk to the Greeks and inspire them with renewed courage for the fight, but he was recognized as a god by his well-formed legs. He aided the Greeks because he had never forgotten that Laomedon cheated him when he built the walls of Troy. But when the Greeks took advantage of a truce for burial of the dead to build a great wall about their ships, Poseidon complained to Zeus that the Greek wall might rival the wall he himself had built about Troy with the aid of Apollo. Zeus soothed him by assuring him that as lord of the sea he could break down the Greek wall whenever he wished, and after the war was over Poseidon diverted the courses of several rivers, washed them against the Greek wall and destroyed it. Though he favored the Greeks in the war, he once rescued Aeneas when he was wounded, out of pity for the Trojan hero. After the war, he joined with Athena to harass the Greeks on their return from Troy by sending great storms at sea. The change of heart of the gods toward the Greeks was occasioned in part by the supposed arrogance of Ajax the Lesser. Poseidon's greatest anger was reserved for Odysseus. On the way home Odysseus stopped at the island of Polyphemus the Cyclops, a son of Poseidon. To escape from him Odysseus blinded Polyphemus. The latter called on Poseidon for vengeance. To avenge his son, Poseidon harried Odysseus unmercifully, and prevented him from returning home for ten years.

In earliest times Poseidon was a god of the depths of the earth. In this aspect he was thought to cause earthquakes, whence his title "Earth-shaker," and was especially worshiped in regions subject to earthquake, as Sparta and Thessaly. It was Poseidon, for example, who cleft the earth with one of his earthquakes and created the Vale of Tempe in Thessaly. In most ancient times he shared the oracle at Delphi with Gaea. When Apollo slew the Python that guarded the oracle and seized it for himself, he gave the island of Calauria, off the coast of Troezen, to Poseidon in exchange for his half of the oracle. Poseidon came increasingly to be worshiped solely as a god of the sea, who had sovereignty over all its waters, everything in them, and navigation on them. He raised storms and caused shipwreck or calmed the waters at his pleasure; he also gave victory at sea, and because he could send favorable winds or victory he was called Soter (Giver of Safety). His temples were usually to be found on promontories and headlands jutting into the sea; typical were those at Taenarum and Sunium, where in the latter place ruins of his temple may still be seen. As god of the sea he was the "Earth-girdler," for the sea was thought to be a vast band surrounding the earth. He was particularly worshiped by seafaring peoples, who claimed descent from him. The island of Chios, for example, was named for a son of Poseidon; Nauplia, the port on the Gulf of Argolis, was founded by his son, Nauplius; the Phaeacians, greatest sailors of legend, were said to be his descendants. Away from the sea, Poseidon was worshiped as the donor of the life-giving waters of springs and fountains. He was also worshiped as a god of horses. His worship was very ancient and extended throughout the Greek world. The Ionians of Helice in Achaea had a very holy sanctuary of Heliconian Poseidon. When they were expelled from Helice they went to Athens, where they continued to worship Heliconian Poseidon. Afterward, the descendants of these Ionians emigrated to the coasts of Asia Minor and colonized the region that came to be known as Ionia. They carried Heliconian Poseidon with them and spread his cult in the expanding Greek world. They raised altars to him near Miletus and in Teos, and in their chief sanctuary on the promontory of Mycale, the Ionians celebrated their great festival in honor of Heliconian Poseidon called the Panionia. As for the original site of the cult of Heliconian Poseidon, Helice in Achaea, Poseidon caused it to be swallowed up by an earthquake and drowned in a flood, because the Achaeans dragged some suppliants from his altar in the shrine there.

The horse, dolphin, and pine tree were sacred to Poseidon. Bulls, especially black ones, were sacrificed to him, and sometimes flung alive into rivers to propitiate him. In Ionia and Thessaly bull-fights were held in his honor. His chief festival was the Isthmian Games, which were held every other year on the Isthmus of Corinth. In these games, of which he was the patron, the victors were crowned with wreaths of his sacred pine. After the victory of the Greeks over the Persians at Plataea (479 B.C.) the Greeks used part of the Persian booty to erect a bronze statue of Isthmian Poseidon ten feet high. Other great statues of Poseidon stood at harbors and on promontories. In art Poseidon is represented as a majestic figure; his most common attributes are the trident, the dolphin, and the horse. The original Roman or Italic Neptune became assimilated to him.

Poseidonius (pos-i-dō'ni-us). See Posidonius.

Posidippus or Poseidippus (pō-sī-dip'us).

Greek poet, one of the most distinguished of the writers of the New Comedy. He was born in Cassandrea, Macedonia, and was active in the first half of the 3rd century B.C. His first work appeared in 289 B.C. Only fragments of his work survive.

Posidonia (pos-i-dō'ni-ā). Original name of Paestum.

Posidonius (pos-i-dō'ni-us). [Also: Poseidonius.] Greek Stoic philosopher; born at Apamea, Syria; fl. at the beginning of the 1st century B.C. He was educated at Athens under the philosopher Panaetius and became known as the most learned man of his time. He traveled widely in western Europe and North Africa in furtherance of his scientific researches, and then went to Rhodes, where he became head of the school of Stoic philosophy. Cicero was one of his pupils. He was active in the affairs of Rhodes and was sent as an envoy to Rome (86 B.C.). Among his Roman friends were such eminent men as Marius and Pompey. He was greatly interested in astronomy, mathematics, natural history, geography, and mythology, and wrote widely on these subjects as well as on philosophy. He also wrote a history of the period 146–88 B.C., continuing the History of Polybius. None of his work, except some meager fragments, survives.

Postvorta (post-vôr'ta). In Roman mythology, a goddess to whom was attributed a knowledge of the past. See Antevorta.

Pothos (pō'thos). The personification of desire and longing. A companion of Aphrodite, along with Eros, Himeros, and the Graces.

Potidaea (pot-i-dē'a). [Also: Cassandrea.]

In ancient geography, a city in Macedonia, situated on the Pallene peninsula, the most westerly of the peninsulas of Chalcidice. The city was founded by colonists from Corinth (c600 B.C.). The Persians, on their way back to the Hellespont after their defeat at Salamis (480 B.C.) attempted to take Potidaea and besieged it, but after three months gave up the siege and withdrew. As a result of a quarrel between Athens and Corinth over Corcyra, Potidaea revolted against Athens (433 B.C.), of whom she had become a tributary ally after the Persian War. Athens sent a force to subdue the city. Corinth sought the aid of Sparta to defend it. The revolt of Potidaea was one of the precipitating causes of the Peloponnesian Wars. The Athenians besieged the city for a year and reduced its inhabitants to starvation. According to Thucydides, they were so driven by their hunger that in certain instances they ate human flesh. The city surrendered (430

B.C.). By the terms of the surrender the inhabitants and their auxiliary soldiers were allowed a free passage out of the city, the men with one garment apiece, the women with two, and a fixed sum of money was allotted them for the journey. Later the Athenians sent colonists to repopulate the city. The city joined the Chalcidian League early in the 4th century. In 364–362 B.C. it fell again under Athenian dominion. Philip II of Macedon captured it (c356 B.C.) and handed it over to Olynthus. The city was largely destroyed, probably during the Olynthian War (348 B.C.), but was rebuilt by Cassander, son of Antipater, who renamed it Cassandrea for himself. For a time it was very powerful, but it was finally destroyed by the Huns. Ruins of the ancient wall are to be found on the site.

Potniae (pot'ni-ē). In ancient geography, a city of Boeotia, Greece. The city had a grove of Demeter and the Maid. Once when the people were sacrificing to Dionysus they became so inflamed with wine that they killed the priest. The city was afterwards smitten by a plague and envoys were sent to Delphi to seek relief. The priestess told them they must sacrifice a boy, but later a goat was substituted by the god himself, who shot a goat and put him in the place of the boy victim. For this reason the inhabitants raised a temple of Dionysus the Goat-shooter. A well in Potniae had the property of driving mares that drank its waters to madness. Between Potniae and Thebes was the place where, some say, the earth opened and swallowed up Amphiaraus and his chariot as he fled from Thebes. A small enclosure marked with pillars was erected about the spot. It was said that birds would not perch on the pillars nor beasts crop the grass of the sacred enclosure.

Pozzuoli, Bay of. Northwestern arm of the Bay of Naples.

Praeneste (prē-nes'tē). [Modern name, Palestrina.] In ancient geography, a city in Latium, Italy, situated on a lofty hill about 23 miles ESE of Rome. According to legend, it was founded by Caeculus, a son of Vulcan. It was built probably as early as the 8th century B.C., and was often opposed to Rome, especially in 380 B.C. when it was captured by Camillus, and in the Latin War (340–338 B.C.), and was later allied with Rome until the time of the Social War (90–88 B.C.), when it received the Roman franchise. It was taken by the partisans of Sulla from the Marians under the younger Marius in 82 B.C. With its clear air and refreshing breezes, it became a favorite summer resort of the Roman nobility (the residence of Augustus, Horace, Tiberius, and Hadrian), and was celebrated for the temple of the goddess Fortuna Primigenia. Connected with the temple was an oracle, the sortes Praenestinae (Praenestine lots), which was consulted in the following manner: Contained in a receptacle were a number of small oak tablets, on which were inscribed enigmatic sentences. When a petitioner wished to consult the oracle, a child drew one of these and handed it to him. He was at liberty to interpret it as he saw fit. Ruins of ancient Praeneste are still visible. These include long sections of fortification wall in polygonal limestone masonry, assignable to the 4th or 3rd century B.C., the vast sanctuary of Fortune, majestically constructed in ascending terraces on the hill slope and still the subject of endless study and discussion, and a large Nile landscape in mosaic. From the cemetery have come the famous Praenestine cists (decorated caskets, as the Ficoroni Cist, q.v.) and the Praenestine fibula (ornamental clasp), with the earliest inscription in Latin. (JJ)

Praenestine Way (prē-nes'tin, -tin). See Via Praenestina.

Praetor (prē'tor). In Roman history, a title which originally designated the consuls as the leaders of the armies of the state. Later (from about 367 B.C.) one praetor, and from about 242 B.C. two praetors were appointed as colleagues to the consuls, and specifically as judicial officers, one of whom (praetor urbanus) tried causes between Roman citizens, and the other (praetor peregrinus) causes between foreigners, or between foreigners and citizens. After the discharge of his judicial functions a praetor had often the administration of a province, with the title of propraetor, or sometimes proconsul. When the dominions of Rome were extended beyond Italy, the number of praetorships was increased, and finally, under the empire, became 18 or even more. The praetor urbanus was the first in rank, and was specifically the Praetor.

Praetorian Camp/Praxiteles

Praetorian Camp (prē-tō'ri-ān). [Also: Pre-torian.] Camp of the Praetorian Guard at ancient Rome, first permanently established by Tiberius, outside the city walls. It formed a square of about 1500 feet to a side, and was enclosed by a brick-faced wall ten feet high, strengthened with towers at its gates. The camp was included by Aurelian (c212–275 A.D.) in his new line of fortifications, and still forms an abrupt projection in the wall on the NE. The fortifications of Aurelian are three times as high as those of Tiberius, but not so well built. The latter, embedded as they are in the newer work, can still be followed for a considerable distance. Within the camp there were monumental buildings with mosaics and marble incrustation. Constantine the Great (274–337 A.D.) abolished the Praetorian Guard, and pulled down the wall of their camp on the side toward the city.

Praetorian Guard. A body of troops originally formed by the emperor Augustus to protect his person and his power, and maintained by successive Roman emperors down to Constantine: so called as practically continuing the organization and functions of the praetoria cohorts, or select troops which attended the person of the praetor or the general of the Republic. These troops were under a special organization, and had special privileges of rank and pay, raising them above the ordinary soldiery. They soon acquired a dangerous power, and for a considerable time raised and deposed emperors at their pleasure.

Prasiae (prā'si-ē) or Prasia (-ā). A coast town of Laconia. The inhabitants claimed that after Dionysus was born, Cadmus placed Semele and her infant in a chest and cast it into the sea. The chest came ashore at Prasiae, and when it was opened Semele was dead. The Prasians gave her a splendid funeral and took care of the infant. After some time Ino came wandering to Prasiae and agreed to take care of the infant Dionysus. The cave where she nursed him was still shown in the 2nd century A.D.

Prasiae. In ancient geography, a place in Attica where there was a temple of Apollo especially connected with Hyperborean

Apollo. First fruits of the Hyperboreans, wrapped in wheaten straw, were sent here. From here, the Athenians took them to Delos. There was a monument to Erysichthon at Prasiae, for he died on the return voyage from Delos after having delivered the Hyperborean first fruits there.

Pratinas (pra'ti-nas). Greek dramatist of Phlius, in the Peloponnesus, who performed at Athens. He was a contemporary and rival of Aeschylus, with whom he first competed c500 B.C. He wrote satyr plays, which he is believed to have invented, as well as tragedies, dithyrambs, and choral odes. Fragments of his work survive.

Praxidicae (prak-sid'i-sē). In Greek religion, three goddesses of justice, especially of retribution. They were often solemnly sworn by, but always in the open air (even their temple had no roof). The singular form of the name was an epithet of Persephone.

Praxis (prak'sis). Epithet of Aphrodite, meaning "Action." In the temple of Aphrodite at Megara was an ivory image of Aphrodite Praxis.

Praxiteles (prak-sit'ē-lēz). Greek sculptor, born at Athens about the end of the 5th century B.C. He was the son of the sculptor Cephisiodotus, and was a younger contemporary of Scopas. His activity lasted until about the time of Alexander the Great, or 336 B.C. Nearly threescore of his works are mentioned in old writers. The characteristics of his work—relaxed and graceful strength, extraordinary modeling and delicate contours—are shown in the statue of Hermes Carrying the Infant Dionysus, identified by Pausanias' description, and found at Olympia in 1877. Of the many works described with admiration and enthusiasm by the ancient writers, the Hermes and three heads are the only surviving originals of Praxiteles. Various works in modern museums are copies of his work. Among them is the Satyr of the Capitol in Rome (the Marble Faun of Hawthorne's novel). Of this there is a story that Phryne, a courtesan who sometimes served as the model for Praxiteles, once asked him to give her the most beautiful of his works. Loverlike, as Pausanias says, he agreed to do so, but couldn't say which he thought was most beautiful. She sent a slave to give him the alarm that fire had broken out in his studio. Praxiteles rushed to the studio, crying that his work was all wasted if fire had destroyed his Satyr and his Eros. Having found out what he most valued, Phryne chose to take the statue of Eros. The original Satyr was in a temple of Dionysus at Athens. Other copies of his work are a beautiful torso discovered in the Palatine, and now in the Louvre; the Apollino of the tribune in Florence; and the Apollo Sauroctonus (Lizard-slayer) of the Vatican. His most celebrated work was the Aphrodite of Cnidus, which, next to the Zeus of Phidias, was the most admired of the statues of antiquity. Of the Aphrodite, it is said that Praxiteles was commissioned to execute a statue of Aphrodite for the Athenians. He made two, one of which was a nude, the first time the female figure had been sculptured without drapery. The Athenians considered the two statues and chose the more conventional draped one. The Cnidians eagerly purchased the nude. This is the statue that came to be known as the Aphrodite of Cnidus.

Praxithea (prak-si'thē-ā). In Greek legend, the wife of Erechtheus, king of Athens. She had four sons, among them, Cecrops who succeeded his father, and seven daughters. She permitted her youngest daughter Otionia (or Chthonia) to be sacrificed when Athens was attacked by the Eleusinians under Eumolpus, grandson of Praxithea. An oracle had foretold that such a sacrifice would save Athens. Protogonia and Pandora, two other daughters killed themselves at the same time, as they had vowed that if one of them must die by violence they would die, too.

Prexaspes (prek-sas'pēz). A faithful Persian attendant of Cambyses II (King of Persia, 529-c521 B.C.) Cambyses ordered him to slay his brother Smerdis (Bardiya), because while Cambyses was in Egypt he dreamed Smerdis sat on the royal throne and his head touched the heavens. Prexaspes returned to Susa and killed Smerdis, either by drowning him or during a hunting expedition. He then returned to Cambyses and reported that he had carried out his orders. On one occasion Cambyses asked Prexaspes what the Persians were saying about him. Prexaspes answered that they praised him greatly but said that he was overfond of wine. Cambyses was furious. He said he would shoot an arrow at the son of Prexaspes; if he hit the child in the heart the Persians who said he was overfond of wine and mad were liars; if he failed to hit the child in the heart, they were speaking the truth. Straightway he carried out his threat. He shot the son of Prexaspes with an arrow, had the body cut open and showed Prexaspes that his arrow had pierced his son's heart. Prexaspes, seeing that he was mad, agreed that the Persians who said Cambyses was mad were liars. Some time later two brothers, Median magi, planned a revolt against Cambyses. One of them looked very much like Cambyses' murdered brother Smerdis, and assumed the same name. While Cambyses was still in Egypt he set himself on the throne, stated that he was Smerdis, son of Cyrus, and declared himself king. Cambyses, hearing of this, thought Prexaspes had betrayed him, and had not slain Smerdis after all. He charged him with betrayal, but Prexaspes assured him his brother was dead. He helped him to learn that it was another Smerdis, a magus, who had rebelled and seized the throne. Thus it was that Cambyses' dream that Smerdis sat upon the royal throne and his head touched the heavens was fulfilled, but it was not his brother Smerdis, but another, and he had caused his brother's murder for nothing. In a rage Cambyses sought to mount his horse, wounded himself on his sword, and shortly thereafter died. Smerdis the rebel magus being still on the throne, Prexaspes now swore that he was the real Smerdis, brother of Cambyses, and also swore that he had not killed him, since it was unsafe to acknowledge the truth after the death of Cambyses. Later Smerdis the magus enlisted the aid of Prexaspes. To quiet rumors that were springing up he asked Prexaspes to go to the top of a tower and announce that the Persians were ruled by Smerdis the son of Cyrus, and no other. He knew that Prexaspes was the man most likely to be believed in this matter. Prexaspes agreed. He went to the tower, recited the genealogy of the Persian kings from the time of Achaemenes, said that he himself, at the command of Cambyses, had killed Smerdis the son of Cyrus, and that the present Smerdis was a magus and an impostor. Then Prexaspes hurled himself head first from the tower and perished.

Priam (pri'am). In Greek legend, a son of Laomedon, king of Troy, and Strymo; and a descendant of Dardanus and Tros. He was originally named Podarces, "swift-footed." When Heracles sacked Troy to punish Laomedon for reneging on his agreement to pay Heracles for the destruction of a sea-monster, Podarces and his sister, Hesione, were taken captive. Laomedon and his other sons were slain. Hesione was awarded to Telamon and was allowed to ransom any one of the captives. She ransomed Podarces with her veil. Henceforth he was called Priam, meaning, according to popular etymology, "redeemed." Heracles gave Laomedon's ruined kingdom to Priam, because he had urged Laomedon to pay Heracles as promised. Priam rebuilt the city on the old site and restored the kingdom to a state of great wealth and prosperity. He first married Arisbe, the daughter of Merops, the seer. By her he had one son, Aesacus. After the birth of this son Priam gave Arisbe to Hyrtacus for a wife, and he married Hecuba. Priam was said to have fathered 50 sons, 19 of them by Hecuba, and 12 daughters. They all lived about the palace courtyard with their wives and husbands. Among Priam's children were Hector, Paris, the twins—Helenus and Cassandra—Deiphobus, Polites, Polydorus, Antiphus, and Troilus; and among his daughters there were Creusa, Laodice, and Polyxena. According to some, Hector and Troilus were Hecuba's sons by Apollo. Ominous portents before the birth of Paris caused Priam to order him to be exposed at birth, but he was saved, and restored as a young man, although seers and prophets urged that he be destroyed or he would bring ruin to Troy. Priam gave his approval when Paris asked for a fleet to sail to Sparta, possibly under the impression that Paris would demand satisfaction for the abduction of Hesione. And when Paris returned, after many months, with Helen of the flawless beauty, Priam, like all Troy, fell in love with her, vowed he would never let her go, and did not chide Paris at all for his flagrant breach of hospitality. He refused all requests by Greek envoys for the return of Helen, and as he was too old to fight himself he entrusted the command of the Trojans to his son Hector. One after another he saw his sons fall before the ferocious onslaughts of the Greeks. When Achilles rejoined the Greeks in their siege against Troy, Priam watched from the towers as Achilles drove Hector to the walls of the city. He pleaded with his son to come inside the walls, but Hector remained to face Achilles and death. The Trojans saw Achilles' barbarous treatment of Hector's body before he dragged it away to the Greek camp behind his chariot. Iris appeared to Priam with a message from Zeus which advised Priam to go to Achilles alone and ransom Hector's body. With one frail companion the aged king set out, carrying great treasure. Hermes came to guide him and spirited him into the tent of Achilles. Some say Achilles was sleeping and that Priam might easily have murdered him and avenged the death of his son. But Priam is always pictured as a man of honor, grave, courteous, and humane, with an abiding interest and love for his children. He appealed to Achilles on his knees for the return of Hector's body. The old king pointed out that few had done what he was doing, kissing the hands that had killed his son. Achilles and Priam wept together—the one for his dead friend, the other for his son. Achilles was touched by the dignity and frailty of the bereaved king who reminded him of his father. He promised to give him Hector's body and to allow the Trojans a truce of as many days as they required to perform funeral honors for Hector. In pride and grief Priam then conveyed his son's body back to Troy and the whole city mourned. In succeeding days Priam was encouraged by the arrival of Penthesilea, Memnon, and Eurypylus, only to see them all fall before the enemy. He also lost Paris, the cause of all the disaster. Now the Greeks resorted to stratagem; they left the Wooden Horse before the walls of Troy. Over the flaming protests of his prophetic daughter Cassandra, and in spite of numerous portents of doom, Priam agreed that the Horse should be drawn inside the city. The sack of Troy followed. The king prepared to join the fighting in defense of his city but was dissuaded, on the grounds of his age and weakness, by Hecuba. He mourned the loss of his sons and wished he had died rather than see the destruction of Troy. With Hecuba he was seated before the altar of Zeus in the courtyard of his palace when his young son Polites rushed in. He was followed by Neoptolemus, and was slain before his father's eyes. In a last glow of wrath Priam attacked the slayer of his son, but Neoptolemus swung on him and slashed off his head with one sweep of his sword. He then dragged the decapitated body to Achilles' tomb and left it there to rot.

Priam. In the Aeneid, a son of Polites, the son of Priam. He was a youthful companion of Ascanius on the flight of the Trojans, under Aeneas, to Italy.

Priamid (prī'a-mid). A name applied to any one of the 50 sons of Priam, king of Troy.

Priapus (prī-ā'pus). In Greek mythology, a god, a son of Dionysus and Aphrodite, the promoter of fertility in crops, cattle, and women. A statue of him was set up in vineyards and gardens to promote fertility, and he was honored in the city as well as in the country. Sometimes also known as Ithyphallus, he is depicted as a faunlike deity with penis always erect. In Rome he was identified with Mutinus (or Mutunus), another fertility god. The first fruits of garden and field were sacrificed to him. Poems composed in his honor were called Priapea. In the Middle Ages he became the protector of cattle, herds, shepherds, farmers, and fishermen, and of women in childbirth.

Priene (prī-ē'nē). In ancient geography, one of the 12 Ionian cities of Asia. It was in Caria, N of Miletus. According to tradition, it was colonized by Ionians and Thebans, who went there under the leadership of a grandson of Codrus, the legendary king of Athens. In the 4th century B.C. the city was rebuilt on the rectangular "gridiron" plan. The site contains many ruins and is a fine example of ancient town planning. The temple of Athena Polias, dedicated 340 B.C., was an Ionic peripteros of six by 11 columns, of marble, graceful in proportion and with delicate decorative sculpture.

Priscus (pris'kus), Helvidius. Roman patriot; son-in-law of Thrasea Paetus. He was exiled by Nero, and again by Vespasian, who put him to death for his fanatic republicanism. He was quaestor in Achaea under Nero, tribune of the people in 56 A.D., and later praetor (70).

Privernum (prī-vēr'num). In ancient geography, a town of C Italy, about 47 miles SE of Rome. It was an ancient Volscian town. About the time when Aeneas landed in Italy, Metabus, the tyrant of the town, was expelled from it because of his tyranny. His daughter Camilla was forced to flee with him. The modern town near the ancient site is Priverno.

Probus (prō'būs), Marcus Valerius. Roman scholar and critic, born at Berytus in Syria; fl. in the late 1st century A.D. His work was devoted to study of republican Roman authors and to critical commentary on the Roman poets.

Prochoös (prō'kō-os). In Greek antiquity, a small vase of elegant form, resembling the oinochoë, but in general more slender, and with a handle rising higher above the rim: used especially to pour water on the hands before meals were served (and also to pour from for libations).

Prochyta (prok'i-tā). Ancient name for Pro-cida, an island at the entrance of the Bay of Naples.

Procida (prō'chē-dā). [Ancient name, Prochyta.] Island at the entrance of the Bay of Naples, about 13 miles SW of Naples, belonging to the province of Napoli, Italy. The surface is rocky and volcanic.

Proclea (prō-klē'a). In Greek legend, the first wife of Cynus of Colona. She was the mother of Tenes and Hemithea.

Procles (prō'klēz). According to Spartan tradition, a son of Aristodemus. He was the twin of Eurysthenes. Because their father died while they were still infants, the Spartans wished to make one of them king but did not know which was the older. On the advice of the oracle of Delphi they made the twins co-kings, and ever after Sparta had two kings. But because they observed their mother as she tended her children, they decided that Eurysthenes was the first-born, because his mother always bathed and nursed him first, so they honored him more than Procles. Procles' line was thus the junior line of the two royal Spartan houses. His son, Soüs, had a son Eurypon, who was so renowned for his deeds that the descendants of Procles were called after him "Eurypondidae."

Procne/Procris

Procne (prók'nē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens. She was the sister of the twins Butes and Erechtheus, and of Philomela. Her father gave her to Tereus, king in Thrace, in marriage, as a reward to Tereus for his aid in defeating the enemies of Pandion. Their wedding was not blessed by the Graces nor by Hera, but the people of Thrace rejoiced at the marriage of their king, and were delighted when a son, Itys, was born to the royal couple. After five years, Procne longed to see her sister and Tereus went to Athens to fetch Philomela for a visit. Pandion yielded to the pleas of Philomela and to the even more ardent ones of Tereus, who had fallen in love with his wife's sister on sight but did not betray himself, and consented to let Philomela go to Thrace with her brother-in-law. The voyage went well, but when they landed Tereus, true to the violence for which the Thracians were noted, could no longer restrain his feelings. He ravished Philomela. She begged him to slay her, as she could not bear to face her sister after such a double betrayal, and when Tereus refused, she vowed vengeance. To silence her, Tereus cut out her tongue and imprisoned her. He returned to Procne and told her that Philomela had died on the voyage. In her prison Philomela wove a tapestry on which was pictured the whole story of her ravishment, maiming, and imprisonment by Tereus. She sent the tapestry by a servant as a gift to the queen, her sister. Procne examined the tapestry and read in it the story of the wrongs that had been done her sister and herself. In secret she went to the house where Philomela was imprisoned and was reunited to her. The sisters returned to the palace secretly and planned their revenge on Tereus. Equally maddened by the faithlessness and crimes of Tereus, the two sisters murdered the child Itys, Procne's son, cut up his flesh, cooked it and served it to Tereus. After he had eaten Procne told him of what his banquet had consisted, and at the same moment confronted him with Philomela. The grief and horror which Tereus knew at the fearsome death of his son temporarily stunned him and the sisters fled. Tereus was then consumed by a bloodthirsty rage. He pursued Procne and Philomela, and was about to kill them near Daulis, when suddenly the gods transformed Procne into a nightingale, whose song is eternally of grief for her son. Philomela was changed into a swallow, and Tereus became a hoopoe, forever pursuing her. In some Latin versions of the myth, the roles of the sisters, or of the birds into which they were transformed, were reversed.

Proconnesus (prō-kon-nē'sus). [Modern name, Marmara.] Island in the W part of the Propontis. It has marble quarries, for which it has been noted since ancient times. Area, about 50 square miles.

Proconsul (prō-kon'sul). In ancient Rome, an officer who discharged the duties and had, outside of Rome itself, most of the authority of a consul, without holding the office of consul. The proconsuls were almost invariably persons who had been consuls, so that the proconsulship was a continuation, in a modified form, of the consulship. They were appointed to conduct a war in or to administer the affairs of some province. The duration of the office was one year.

Procris (prō'kris). In Greek legend, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and the sister of Orithyia. She was married to Cephalus and loved him deeply. He was carried off by Eos, the goddess of Dawn, and returned to Procris in disguise to test her fidelity. After many protestations of love and the offerings of rich gifts, Procris, who had been grieving for her husband, yielded. Cephalus immediately denounced her, revealed himself, and deserted her. According to some accounts, she fled from Athens and forswore the company of men, devoted herself to hunting as a companion of Artemis. Artemis gave her a marvelous hound, Lelaps, that could not fail to catch his quarry, and a spear that always hit its target. Others say Procris fled to Crete after Cephalus deserted her, and there she was seduced by King Minos, and that it was he who gave her the hound and the spear, which he had received from Artemis. She later joined Cephalus on a hunting expedition, disguised as a beautiful youth, Pterelas, and agreed to give him the hound and the spear, but only for love. Cephalus accepted this proposal and she then revealed herself as his wife. The couple was happily reunited and spent some years in devotion to each other. But Artemis was displeased by the manner in which her gifts were being handed around. She caused Procris to suspect that Cephalus was still meeting a lover in secret. She had overheard him calling on a breeze to cool him, and thinking it was a lover he summoned, she jealously followed him on one of his hunting trips. As she spied on him from a thicket the bushes which hid her moved; Cephalus, thinking the movement was caused by a wild beast, hurled his spear and transfixed her. Her spirit fled to the Underworld, where Odysseus saw her when he visited there on his way home from the Trojan War.

Procris. In Greek legend, the eldest daughter of Thespius, king of Thespieae, and Megamede. By Heracles, who had come to Thespieae to hunt a lion, she was the mother of twin sons.

Procrustes (prō-krus'tēz). In Greek legend, an outlaw who lived near the road to Athens, in Attica. It was his custom to offer hospitality to travelers. He had a bed (named for him the Procrustean bed) which he insisted his guests use. Those who were too short he stretched on a rack to fit it, and those who were too long had their legs sawed off to the proper length. Some say he had two beds; one short which he offered to tall travelers, then cut off their legs to fit it; and one long on which he stretched short travelers. Theseus, who passed his house on his way to Athens, killed him. He was also known under the names of Damastes, Polypemon, and Procoptas. He was the father of Sinis, the "Pine-bender."

Proculus Julius (prō'kū-lus jū'li-us). In Roman legend, a citizen to whom Romulus appeared in a vision shortly after he had been carried off to heaven by the lightning. He told Proculus, "My Rome shall be the capital of the world; so let the Romans cherish the art of war, and let them know and teach their children that no human strength can resist Roman arms." After saying this, Romulus departed on high. Proculus reported the vision to the Roman people and thus assured them that Romulus had become immortal.

Prodicus (prod'i-kus). Greek sophist and rhetorician. He was a native of the island of Ceos, and was active in the second half of the 5th century B.C. He spent much time at Athens, as an ambassador from Ceos, and was a friend of Euripides and a contemporary of Socrates. In his lectures he laid great emphasis on the proper discrimination of synonyms. It was Prodicus who told the story of Heracles at the crossroads, faced with a choice between two women, one of whom represented Pleasure, the other Virtue. Heracles, according to the fable, chose Virtue. The fable is preserved in Xenophon's Memorabilia.

Prodromia (prō-drō'mi-ā). Epithet of Hera, meaning "Pioneer." The name was given to the goddess by Phalaces, son of Temenus, because he said Hera guided him on the road to Sicyon, where he later raised a temple of Hera Prodromia.

Proetus (prō-ē'tus). In Greek legend, a son of Abas, king of Tiryns in Argolis. He and his twin Acrisius fought in their mother's womb and continued the struggle ever afterwards. Proetus violated Acrisius' daughter, Danaë, lost control of the throne to his brother, and fled to Iobates, king of Lycia. Iobates gave him his daughter Antia in marriage and helped him to win back Tiryns from Acrisius, which Proetus then turned into a fortress with the aid of the Gasterocheires. Proetus and Antia had three daughters: Iphianassa, Iphinoë, and Lysippe, who were driven mad for offending either Dionysus or Hera. Melampus offered to cure them but Proetus thought the price—a part of his kingdom—too high. Then all the women of Tiryns went mad and Proetus was forced to use, and pay for, Melampus' services to cure them. Bellerophon fled to the court of Proetus and was hospitably received by him. However, Antia fell in love with Bellerophon and when he spurned her advances she accused him falsely of making love to her against her will and demanded his death. Proetus feared to offend the gods by killing one to whom he had offered hospitality so he sent Bellerophon to Antia's father, Iobates, with a secret message instructing Iobates to kill Bellerophon. Proetus had a son, Megapenthes, who succeeded him as ruler of Tiryns.

Promachorma (prō-ma-kôr'mā). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Protectress of the Anchorage." There was a sanctuary of Athena Promachorma at Buporthmus (Ox-ford), on the promontory of Argolis, near Hermione. Promachus (prom'a-kus) or Promachos (prom'a-kos). A diety, as Athena or Apollo, who fights before some person, army, or state, as a protector or guardian. In art and archaeology the type is distinguished by the attitude of combat, often with upraised shield and the spear or other weapon extended threateningly. Also, an epithet of Athena, meaning, "the Defender."

Promachus. Named by Homer in the Iliad as a Boeotian leader. He was slain by Acamas, son of Antenor, as he stooped to strip the armor from Archelochus, brother of Acamas, whom he had just killed.

Promachus. In Greek legend, a son of Parthenopaeus the Arcadian. He was one of the Epigoni who successfully marched against Thebes to avenge their fathers.

Prometheus (prō-mē-thē-us). In Greek mythology, a Titan, the son of Iapetus and the nymph Clymene, or as some say, the son of Themis, who revealed the secrets of the future to him. His brothers were Epimetheus, Atlas, and Menoetius, all of whom suffered at the hands of Zeus. He was the father of Deucalion, king of Phthia, and warned him that Zeus was going to send a flood to destroy mankind; he advised Deucalion to build an ark to save himself and his wife. When the Titans waged war on the Olympian gods, Prometheus, who knew what the outcome would be, took the side of Zeus, after the Titans had scorned his advice, and helped him to defeat the Titans and make himself king. According to some accounts it was Prometheus who split the skull of Zeus so that Athena, fully armed, could spring from his head. She taught Prometheus many arts and these he passed on to man. Some say Prometheus created man by forming an image from the clay and water of Phocis, into which Athena then breathed life. He caused man, alone of the animals, to walk erect and lift his head to the sun and the stars. He taught men the use of numbers and letters, how to build ships and sail the seas, how to cultivate the fields and tame beasts to work for them; all human arts come from Prometheus. When Zeus was firmly in power he took no thought for mankind and would have blotted out the race of men altogether. Only Prometheus interceded for man and Zeus relented. Prometheus was once called upon to judge which parts of a sacrificial animal should be reserved to the gods and which to men. He cut up a bull and placed all the flesh into one bag, made of the bull's hide. But on top of the good flesh he laid the stomach of the bull, the least appetizing part of the animal. In a second bag he placed all the picked bones of the animal, but disguised the fact that there were only bones in the bag by covering them with a layer of rich fat. He asked Zeus to choose one of the two bags. The one chosen would contain the parts reserved for the gods in a sacrifice. Zeus, either because he was duped, or because he wished an excuse to punish men, chose the bag containing the bare bones, and henceforth bones wrapped in fat were offered the gods in sacrifices. But Zeus was angered by this successful deception and decreed that though men would have the flesh of the animals they would have to eat it raw, as he would now withhold the gift of fire from mankind. Prometheus, ever pitying mankind's vulnerable state, stole fire from heaven and, carrying it in a fennel reed, gave it to man. Zeus counterbalanced this great benefit by sending Pandora, the first mortal woman, to Prometheus' brother, Epimetheus, for a wife. Prometheus warned his brother not to accept any gift from Zeus, but Epimetheus married her anyway. Zeus punished Prometheus for stealing the divine fire by ordering Hephaestus to bind him in fetters to a rock in the Caucasus forever. Prometheus, bound to his lonely rock, proclaimed that Destiny had declared his ultimate deliverance and that Zeus would one day be dethroned because of a foolish marriage, even as he himself had dethroned his father Cronus. Prometheus said he knew all these things from his mother. (His name means "forethought".) Zeus sent Hermes to learn from Prometheus what marriage would cause his downfall, so that he could avoid it, but Prometheus, defiant even in chains, refused to reveal his secret. To add to his torment Zeus hurled the rock to which he was chained into Tartarus and sent an eagle which daily tore at Prometheus' liver (which was nightly restored). For 1000 years, or as some say, 30, Prometheus hung on his rock in torment. Heracles came to the Caucasus, where the rock had now emerged, after one of his labors, and begged Zeus to free Prometheus. Zeus was willing to do so because Prometheus had warned Zeus in time not to marry the Nereid Thetis, as she would bear a son greater than his father. But Prometheus could not be freed until some other immortal would go to Tartarus in his place. Chiron, doomed to eternal suffering because he had been accidentally wounded by one of Heracles' poisoned arrows, gladly gave up his immortality to end his own and Prometheus' sufferings. Zeus consented to this exchange but decreed that Prometheus must eternally wear a ring, containing a stone of the rock to which he had been chained, to show that he had been a prisoner. This was the first instance of a ring being worn. Heracles shot the eagle which had tormented Prometheus, and he was set free. To honor Prometheus, men began to wear rings, as he was compelled to do, and wreaths, because he was ordered to crown himself with a willow wreath when he was freed. Zeus set the arrow with which Heracles killed the eagle among the stars as the constellation Sagitta.

Prometheus went back to Olympus and resumed his role as adviser to the gods. He was honored with an altar, shared by Hephaestus, and an annual torch race in Athens.

Prometheus Bound. A tragedy by Aeschylus, of uncertain date. It is the first of a trilogy, the other two parts of which, Prometheus Unbound and Prometheus the Fire-bearer, have been lost. In this trilogy Aeschylus treats the legend of the Titan Prometheus who pitied frail and vulnerable man and gave him the precious gift of fire to improve his pitiable state. In stealing fire and giving it to man Prometheus defied a law of heaven and incurred the wrath of Zeus. Prometheus Bound tells of the awful punishment which Zeus visited on Prometheus for his defiance and of the manner in which Prometheus, continuing to defy Zeus, met his punishment.

The scene is a rocky gorge in Scythia. Cratus (Power) and Bia (Force) enter, carrying Prometheus as a captive. They are accompanied by Hephaestus. Cratus turns Prometheus over to Hephaestus to bind in chains. Hephaestus is reluctant to fetter one of his fellow gods but dares not defy Zeus, yet he regrets the cruelty of Zeus that demands such a punishment. Cratus and Bia urge Hephaestus, whose own fire Prometheus has stolen, to use his craft and not delay any more; he must carry out his orders, for only Zeus is free. Hephaestus forges the fetters and binds Prometheus to the lonely rock, lamenting that his art is, for the first time, used to bring harm rather than good; he groans for Prometheus' sufferings, but does as he is commanded to do by Zeus, and leaves. Cratus taunts the now immobilized Prometheus, asking him if the mortals for whom he stole divine fire will now help him, and then departs. Throughout this prologue Prometheus scorns to speak to the minions of Zeus. Now alone in the silence of the gorge he calls all nature to witness what he suffers at the hands of another god. He recalls how he stole fire and hid it in a reed to give it to men, and charges that Zeus has become his enemy because he loved mankind too well. A chorus of Oceanids enters, drawn in a winged car. They say they heard the sound of iron being forged and have come from their cavern in the ocean to learn the reason. They speak of Zeus as the new ruler who has brought new laws. Prometheus reveals that he knows of one who will try to unseat Zeus, and that Zeus will call upon him in vain to reveal the secret. The Oceanids observe that the calamity which has befallen Prometheus has not broken his spirit. He repeats that the pride of Zeus will be humbled, and that one day Zeus will ardently seek the friendship of Prometheus. The Oceanids ask why he is bound. He relates how he advised the Titans to accept Zeus but they scorned his advice. He took the side of Zeus and helped him to dethrone Cronus and become the ruler of the gods. But Zeus, once in power, took no thought for man and would have blotted out mankind altogether. Only Prometheus opposed the plan. He had mercy for mortals but could find none for himself. He gave mankind hope and fire and this is the reason for his punishment. The Oceanids conclude that Prometheus erred to defy the ruler of the gods, and advise him to seek release for his sufferings. He answers that he has acted with his eyes wide open: he knew in advance what the consequences would be. Oceanus enters and asks what he can do to help Prometheus. Prometheus bitterly asks if he has come to look upon his ruin, to see the friend who helped Zeus to a throne now suffering torments. Oceanus advises him to be more prudent in his language, lest Zeus overhear, and to use his cunning to seek some respite from his sufferings. He offers to intercede with Zeus. Prometheus reminds him of the fate of Atlas and Typhon, and speaks of the implacable anger of Zeus. He advises Oceanus to look after himself, and adds that he will only incur the wrath of Zeus if he interferes to help Prometheus. Oceanus, saying the calamity of Prometheus will be a lesson to him, departs. The chorus sings that the whole world laments for Prometheus. He answers by recalling his pity for mankind—all human arts, he says, come from Prometheus. He could be endlessly inventive for man but was not able to escape disaster for himself. To the chorus' statement that he should not care more for mortals than for himself he replies that Destiny, before whom even Zeus must bow, has decreed his deliverance. He will not divulge his secret as the time has not yet come, but he knows that one day he will be freed from his present bondage. The chorus sings, offering a prayer that they may never offend Zeus. They chide Prometheus for not fearing Zeus enough and for honoring mortals too much, especially since feeble men can do nothing to help him in his present straits. Io, transformed into a heifer, enters, bewailing her miserable state. What has she done, she asks, that Zeus causes her to suffer so? She asks Prometheus who he is and why he is in chains. He tells her, and agrees to tell her what he knows of her future, though "loth to bruise her heart." But first the Oceanids want to hear Io's story. She tells of the sufferings she has endured at the will of heaven: how she confessed to her father Inachus the dreams she had of being wooed by Zeus, and how her father, after consulting the oracle at Delphi, drove her into exile lest he incur the anger of Zeus. Then she was transformed into her present shape of a heifer and was driven by a gadfly to wander over the earth, ever pursued by the shade of Argus. Now she wants to know what is to come, no matter how terrible it is. Prometheus tells her that Hera has more evils in store for her: she will be driven into Asia. She longs to die. They cannot die, Prometheus says, and he will know no relief until Zeus loses his supremacy. He assures Io that this will happen, and it will come about through Zeus' own folly. He will take a bride whose son will be mightier than the god, and unless Prometheus is freed this son will dethrone Zeus. He tells Io she will wearily journey until she arrives at the Nile delta. There she will establish her home and her family. Zeus will gently touch her and she will bear Epaphus, who will become lord of the region. He prophesies the flight of the 50 Danaids, descendants of Epaphus, to Argos, and tells that one of the 50 will spare her husband on the wedding night, when her sisters kill their bridegrooms, and that from this one a royal race will rise in Argos that will produce Prometheus' deliverer. All this, he says, he has learned from his mother Themis. Io, driven by the gadfly, departs in despair. The chorus sings a prayer that they will never be loved by any one outside their station, after seeing the misery it has brought to Io. Prometheus again declares that Zeus will be humbled, and only he knows how to prevent the disaster to Zeus. When the irresistible champion comes, Zeus will find out what a difference there is between ruling and being a slave. The leader of the chorus advises Prometheus to be more discreet in his words, lest Zeus contrive even worse torments for him. Prometheus answers that he is fated not to die, and is prepared for anything. Hermes, the "lackey of Zeus," now enters. He has come to find out what marriage it is that will bring about the dethronement of Zeus. Prometheus tells him to trudge back the road he came; he is not going to reveal his secret and he would not exchange his hard lot for Hermes' menial one. Prometheus continues to mock Hermes, and refuses to reveal the knowledge that will prevent Zeus from being overthrown. Prometheus' pride is undiminished by his sufferings. Hermes warns him of further tortures, of the lightning and of the eagle that will gnaw at his vitals. The leader of the chorus cautions Prometheus to abandon his pride and accept wise counsel. Prometheus answers that he knows all that is to come, and Zeus, no matter what he does, cannot destroy Prometheus. Hermes thinks his mind is unhinged. He warns the chorus to leave before Zeus looses the lightning, and departs. Lightning flashes, thunderbolts split the rock on which Prometheus is chained. The chorus scatters. As an additional punishment for refusing to disclose his secret Prometheus sinks slowly down to Tartarus through the chasm opened by the lightning, crying out to Mother Earth to witness the wrongs he endures at the hands of Zeus.

Prometheus, Charm of. According to Greek legend, a plant or flower that rose from the ground where the drops of ichor fell from Prometheus as the eagle gnawed at his liver. This herb conferred invulnerability on the person and weapons that were anointed with it. The invulnerability lasted for one day. Medea gave an ointment of it to Jason to protect him from the fire-breathing bulls which her father required him to yoke.

Pronaos (prō-nā'os). An open vestibule or portico in front of the naos or cella of a Greek temple.

Propertius (prō-pēr'shus), Sextus. Roman elegiac poet, born at Assisi, in Umbria, Italy, between 54 and 48 B.C.; died after 16 B.C. He lost his father at an early age, and lost his estates, 42 B.C., when the land was given to the Roman veterans. Nevertheless, enough remained of his patrimony to educate him. He went to Rome, c34 B.C., and later spent some time at Athens in furtherance of his studies. He began to write at an early age. Many of his love poems concern his passion for his mistress Hostia, who appears as Cynthia in the poems, and who shared his interest in literature and encouraged him to develop his poetic powers. The intimate relationship between Propertius and Hostia began in 28 B.C. and lasted, with various eruptions of jealousy on both sides, storms and reconciliations, until 23 B.C. During this time Propertius published the first of his four books of poetry and dedicated it to his mistress. His work was immediately recognized and he came to the attention of Maecenas, who became his patron. This association brought him into contact with other writers, notably Vergil and Ovid, who became his friends. The affair with Hostia, which suffered a definite break in 23 B.C., may have been resumed. Even after her death he wrote of her. Propertius is presumed to have died young, as the last of his work dates from 16 B.C. His poems, many of which deal with his love for Cynthia and his own melancholy thoughts, and a few of which deal with the events of his day, are noted for their richness of imagination, the ardor of his passion, his awareness and love of beauty, and by his unusual use of his wide vocabulary. He has been ranked next to

Propoetides/Protagoras of Abdera

Catullus as the poet of the transports and torments of the passion of love.

Propoetides (prō-pō-ē'ti-dēz). In mythology, maidens of Amathus, in Cyprus. They flagrantly denied the divinity of Aphrodite. To punish them Aphrodite caused them to become wantons, and later they were turned into stone. Some say it was the sight of these women and their immoral lives that made Pygmalion decide to remain a bachelor, and to carve a statue of a woman who would be free from their faults.

Propontis (prō-pon'tis). [Modern name, Sea of Marmara or Marmora.] Sea communicating with the Euxine Sea on the NE by the Thracian Bosphorus, and with the Aegean Sea on the SW by the Hellespont. Length, about 170 miles; greatest width, about 50 miles.

Propylaea (prop-i-lē'a). Monumental gateway to the Acropolis at Athens, begun 437 B.C. by Mnesicles. It consists of a central ornamented passage and two projecting wings, that on the N with a chamber (the Pinacotheca) behind its small portico. The central passage has on both W and E faces a magnificent hexastyle Doric portico. At about two thirds of its length it is crossed by a wall pierced with five doorways, the widest and highest in the middle. An inclined way passes through the wider middle intercolumniations of both great porches and the large central door; this way was flanked between the W portico and the door by six tall Ionic columns, whose capitals supply the most beautiful type of the order.

Propylaeum (prop-i-lē'um). An important architectural vestibule or entrance to a sacred inclosure or other precinct, as that of the Acropolis of Athens, or that of the sanctuary of Eleusis; usually in the plural: propylaea. In its origin it was a strongly fortified gateway, but it became developed into an ornamental structure, often elaborate and magnificent, with which were combined gates of more or less defensive strength.

Prosclystius (pros-kli's'ti-us). Name given to Poseidon, meaning "Flooder," because he flooded a large part of Argolis when the river-gods awarded the land to Hera instead of to him. Hera persuaded him to send the sea back, and the Argives erected a sanctuary to him at the spot where the tide ebbed.

Proserpina (prō-sēr'pi-na). Latin form of Persephone.

Prostaterius (pros-ta-tē'ri-us). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Protecting." In the sanctuary of Apollo Prostaterius at Megara there were images of Apollo, Artemis, and Leto by Praxiteles.

Protagoras (prō-tag'ō-ras). Dialogue of Plato; the narration by Socrates of a conversation which took place in the house of Callias, a wealthy Athenian, between himself, the Sophists Protagoras, Hippias, and Prodicus, Hippocrates, Alcibiades, and Critias. The theme of this celebrated dialogue is virtue, its nature, unity, and teachableness; it is also a study of the sophistic teachers in the person of one of their best representatives, the famous Protagoras of Abdera. It closes with the well-known conclusion of Socrates that virtue is knowledge.

Protagoras of Abdera (ab-dir'a). Greek Sophist, born c485 B.C. at Abdera, in Thrace; died c411 B.C. He was the earliest of the class of teachers called Sophists who accepted payment for his teachings. He traveled throughout Greece teaching, but spent a great deal of time at Athens, where he was acquainted with the leading men of his day, among them the poet Euripides who was his good friend. He was highly esteemed for his learning. At the request of Pericles, with whom he is said to have spent an entire day arguing various theories of punishment, he drew up the laws for the new colony of Thurii (444 B.C.). In his teaching Protagoras took as his point of departure a belief that man has an inherent sense of justice, that the soul (or psyche or character) can be shaped by education, and that social and political virtue can be taught. His tools were grammar (which he systematized by distinguishing the parts of speech), rhetoric, music, and poetry. The last two were to bring the soul into the harmony and rhythm essential for the attainment of virtue. The education of the soul, as distinct from education in certain techniques that might be learned once and for all, was considered by Protagoras to be a lifelong process. In the last years of his life he wrote a treatise On the Gods, that began as follows, "In regard to the gods I cannot know that they exist, nor yet that they do not exist; for many things hinder such knowledge—the obscurity of the matter, and the shortness of human life." He was charged with impiety because of this work, although in it he did not deny the existence of the gods, and fled from Athens. On his way to Sicily he was lost at sea. Protagoras is best known from his famous dictum on the relativity of all knowledge, "Man is the measure of all things; of those which are, that they are; of those which are not, that they are not."

Protesilaus (prō-tes-i-lā'us). In Greek legend, a son of Iphiclus (whose impotence was cured by Melampus), and an uncle of Philoctetes. He and his brother Podarces came from Phylace to join the Greeks in the war against Troy. According to a prophecy, the first man to set foot on Trojan ground was destined to be killed. Protesilaus, who some say knew of the prophecy, was the first to leap ashore and was killed, either by Hector or by Euphorbus. He was buried in Thracian Chersonese and was awarded divine honors. Nymphs planted a grove about his barrow, and it is said that the leaves of the trees which faced Troy withered rapidly and fell to the ground, whereas the leaves on the trees away from Troy stayed green all winter. Protesilaus was married to Laodamia, daughter of Acastus (others say his wife was Polydora, daughter of Meleager), and when she learned of his death she grieved so that the gods permitted him to return from the Underworld for three hours to visit her. He used this time to urge her to follow him to the Underworld, and when the time came for his departure she committed suicide.

Proteus (prō'tē-us, prō'tūs). In classical mythology, an oracular sea-god, the son of Oceanus and Tethys, who had the power of assuming different shapes. If caught, however, and held fast through all his many changes until he reassumed his own shape, he was compelled to answer questions. With the help of Idothea, daughter of Proteus, Menelaus disguised himself in a seal skin and caught Proteus when he took his daily nap among his seals on the island of Pharos in the Nile Delta. He forced Proteus to tell him how he could escape from Pharos, where he was becalmed on his way home from Troy, and to tell him what had happened to the Ajaxes, Agamemnon, and Odysseus. Aristaeus also overcame Proteus on his island home, and forced him to tell him why his bees sickened and died.

Proteus. According to Euripides, a king of Egypt who lived on the island of Pharos. He married Psamathe, widow of Aeacus, and by her was the father of Theoclymenus and the prophetess Theonoë. In one version of his story, he kept and protected Helen when she was wafted to Egypt from Sparta, while a phantom Helen went with Paris to Troy.

Prothoënor (prō-thō-ē'nōr). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a son of Areilycus. He was a leader of the Boeotians at the siege of Troy, and was felled by Polydamas when the Trojans attacked the fortifications protecting the Greek ships.

Protopenes (prō-toj'e-nēz). Greek painter; born at Caunus, in Caria, Asia Minor (or at Xanthus in Lycia); fl. in the second half of the 4th century B.C. He spent most of his life at Rhodes. He was noted for the care and time he spent on each of his paintings, and is said to have put four layers of paint on some of his works so that if the first layer wore off the next would replace it. Among his most famous works was the Ialysus, of which the subject was the hero who founded the town that bore his name on Rhodes. Protopenes is said to have spent seven years in completing the picture. It was at Rhodes for at least 200 years, then was carried off to Rome and placed in the Temple of Peace, where it perished when the temple was destroyed by fire. Another of his famous works was the Resting Satyr on which he worked at Rhodes all during the siege of the city by Demetrius Poliorcetes (305-304 B.C.), regardless that the garden in which he worked was in the midst of the enemy camp. It is said that Demetrius, on learning of the artist's presence, took measures to protect him and his work. He also had paintings in the Propylaea and the Bouleterium at Athens. It is said that Protopenes was a poor and self-taught man, whose great skill and art went unrecognized until Apelles, his great contemporary, publicly and generously expressed his admiration for them.

Protopenia (prō'tō-je-nī'ā) or Protopenea (-ē'ā). According to some accounts, the daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha. She was the first woman to be born after the great flood that Zeus sent on the world and from which only Protogonia (prō'tō-gō-nī'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and his wife Praxithea. When her sister, Otionia (or Chthonia), was sacrificed to bring victory to Athens, in the war with the Eleusinians, Protogonia fulfilled a vow and killed herself.

Provincia (prō-vin'shi-a, -shā). [Also: Gallia Provincia, Provincia Gallica.] In ancient geography, the part of Gaul conquered by the Romans at the end of the 2nd century B.C. It corresponded originally to the later Provence, Dauphiné, and Languedoc.

Prylis (pri'lis). In Greek legend, a seer. He was the son of Hermes and a nymph, and accompanied the Greeks to Troy. According to some accounts, it was he, inspired by Athena, who suggested the ruse of the Wooden Horse as a means of overcoming Troy.

Prytaneum (prit-a-nē'um). A public hall in ancient Greek states and cities, housing and typifying the common ritual or official hearth of the community. That of Athens is especially famous. In it the city extended hospitality both to her honored citizens and to strangers. The prytanes, or chief magistrates, were entertained in it at the public charge, together with those who, on account of personal or ancestral services, were entitled to this honor.

Prytanis (prit'a-nis). Named by Homer (Iliad), as one of the Lycian companions of Sarpedon. He was slain by Odysseus as he tried to protect Sarpedon, who had been taken off the field, wounded.

Psamathe (sam'a-thē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Crotopus of Argos. Fearing her father's wrath, she exposed the infant Linus whom she had born to Apollo, but he was found and reared by shepherds. In his youth he was torn to pieces by dogs and Psamathe's intense grief over his death revealed that she was his mother. When Crotopus perceived this he condemned her to death. Apollo sent a monster to destroy the children of Argos in revenge, and withdrew his punishment only when a shrine had been erected between Argos and Delphi. The songs of mourning for Linus and Psamathe, sung by the Argive women at Apollo's command, were sung annually at this shrine and became known as Linus songs.

Psamathe. In Greek mythology, a Nereid. She attempted to escape the attentions of Aeacus, who wished to marry her, by changing herself into a seal, but in vain. By Aeacus she was the mother of Phocus. She sent a fierce wolf against Telamon and Peleus, half-brothers of Phocus, to avenge their murder of her son. Thetis, sister of Psamathe, turned the wolf to stone. After the death of Aeacus Psamathe married Proteus, king of Egypt, and bore him Theoclymenus and Theonœ.

Pseudo-Smerdis (sō'dō-smēr'dis). See Smerdis, False.

Psiax (sī'aks). Attic vase-painter, active c520 B.C. Formerly called the Menon Painter, from an amphora (Philadelphia) made by the potter Menon, he was later identified by two vases signed by him as painter and by Hilinus as potter. Twenty-eight other vessels have been attributed to him. With the Andocides Painter, he was one of the earliest to use the red-figure style. Active when this style was beginning to replace black-figure, he worked in both, and sometimes used both on the same vessel.

Psophis (sō'fis). In ancient geography, a town in NW Arcadia. Some say it was founded by Psophis, a descendant of Lycaon. Others say Psophis was a daughter of Eryx, the despot of Sicania (Sicily). They say Heracles violated her, but refused to take her to his land. He left her with a friend (Lycortes), who lived at Phegia in Arcadia. The sons born to Psophis and Heracles—Echephron and Promachus—were brought up in Phegia, and when they grew up they changed the name of the place to Psophis after their mother. They also established a sanctuary of Erycine Aphrodite in Psophis. Alcmaeon, son of Amphiaras, fled here after killing his mother. He married the daughter of King Phegeus, but was forced to flee again by order of the oracle of Delphi. Later he returned and was murdered by the sons of Phegeus. His tomb was in Psophis; surrounding it were great cypresses called "Maidens." Since they were sacred to him they were never cut down and reached gigantic height. Because of their enmity toward the Argives on account of Alcmaeon, the people of Psophis took no part in the Trojan War. The river Erymanthus, near which Heracles slew the Erymanthian Boar, runs through Psophis. Nearby was a temple of Erymanthus containing an image of the river-god.

Psyche (sī'kē). In Greek mythology, a mortal maiden, beloved by Eros, the god of love, who after long tribulation and suffering was accorded her place among the gods as the equal of her god consort. Psyche as personification of the soul came into Greek mythology in the 4th–5th centuries B.C. Psyche as soul symbolized by a butterfly first appeared in the 5th century B.C. Before this the soul was conceived of and depicted either as a bird or as the spirit-double of the individual. For the myth, see Cupid and Psyche.

Psychopompus (sī'kō-pom'pus). An epithet of Hermes as the conductor or guide of souls or spirits to the Underworld.

PSYKTER

Psyttalia or Psyttaleia (sit-ā-lī'ā). An islet lying between Salamis and the mainland of Greece. With the Greek fleet anchored in the harbor at Salamis the Persians, planning a sea fight, sent a body of troops to Psyttalia, partly for the purpose of enclosing the Greeks and partly in the hope of destroying them as the wrecks of their fleet drifted to the island after the battle. In the event, the Persian fleet was beaten, and the Persian troops on Psyttalia were attacked and cut to pieces by the Greeks under the command of Aristides and totally destroyed (480 B.C.).

Ptleon (tel'e-on). Name which Cephalus assumed when he returned, in disguise, to his wife Procris after he had been carried off by Eos, the goddess of Dawn. In his guise as Ptleon, Cephalus tested his wife's fidelity.

Pterelas (ter'e-las). Name that Procris assumed when she appeared to Cephalus, disguised as a beautiful youth, to try and regain his love. It is said that when Cephalus leaped into the sea, he called the name "Pterelas," because it was under that name that his wife won back his love.

Pterelaus (ter-e-lā'us). In Greek legend, a son or grandson of Poseidon, who had provided him with one gold lock of hair which conferred immortality on Pterelaus. He was king of the Teleboans. With the Taphians he attacked Electryon's kingdom, killed his eight sons, and stole his cattle. Electryon's daughter Alcmena had been promised to Amphitryon, but she would not allow the marriage to be consummated until her brothers were avenged. Amphitryon therefore made war on Pterelaus. Comaetho, daughter of Pterelaus, saw Amphitryon and fell in love with him. To help him she plucked the golden lock from her father's head. Pterelaus died and Amphitryon achieved a crushing victory over the Taphians and Teleboans.

Ptolemy I/Ptolemy V

Ptolemy I (tol'e-mi) (of Egypt). [Surnamed Soter, meaning "Savior" or "Preserver," and Lagi, "Son of Lagus;" Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (306–285 B.C.), founder of the Greek dynasty in that country. He was born c367 B.C.; died 283 B.C. He was the alleged son of Lagus, a Macedonian of ignoble birth, and Arsinoë; but as Arsinoë had been the concubine of Philip II of Macedon, he was commonly supposed by his contemporaries to be the son of that monarch. He was one of Alexander the Great's most trusted generals, serving as one of those who guarded the king's person, and holding a place of high command. He accompanied Alexander throughout the Asiatic campaigns, of which he wrote a history. On the journey of Alexander to the oracle of Zeus Ammon in Libya, Ptolemy records as evidence of divine interest in Alexander that two snakes slithered along in front of the Macedonians to guide them through the trackless desert to the shrine, where the priest addressed Alexander as a son of Zeus. Ptolemy was one of those given a Persian princess, Artacama, for a bride at the great marriage festival celebrated by Alexander at Susa (324 B.C.), but after the event the princess seems to have disappeared from Ptolemy's history. In the distribution of the provinces on the death of Alexander in 323 B.C. Ptolemy obtained the government of Egypt. He managed to gain possession of Alexander's body and carried it off to Memphis until a suitably magnificent burial could be arranged. In so doing he incurred the enmity of Perdiccas, who had become regent of Asia. Ptolemy formed an alliance with Antipater against Perdiccas. He married Eurydice, daughter of Antipater, to strengthen the alliance but later put her aside in favor of his own half-sister Berenice. Perdiccas invaded Egypt in 321 B.C. but was murdered by his own troops. In the involved struggles of the Diadochi (the "successors" of Alexander) Ptolemy periodically invaded, won, and lost part of Syria; won, lost, and won Cyprus; subdued Cyrene; took Corinth, Megara, and Sicyon in Greece, but did not retain them. He afterward concluded an alliance with Cassander, Seleucus, and Lysimachus against Antigonus, who fell in the battle of Ipsus in 301 B.C. He assumed the title of king in 306 or 304. In 304 B.C. his efficient support of the Rhodians against Demetrius enabled them to repel his formidable attack, whence he received the surname Soter or Preserver from the Rhodians, who thereafter awarded him divine honors. During his reign Alexandria became the Egyptian capital; the library was founded by him and he made the city a place where scholars could work. He abdicated in 285 B.C., in favor of Ptolemy II, his son by Berenice.

Ptolemy II (of Egypt). [Surnamed Philadelphus; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (285–246 B.C.); son of Ptolemy I. He was born in the island of Cos, 309 B.C., and died 246 B.C. He annexed Phoenicia and Coele-Syria, encouraged commerce, literature, science, and art, and raised the Alexandrian Museum and Library, founded by his father, to importance. He completed the Pharos, and is credited by ancient writers with authorizing the Bible translation known as the Septuagint, and the Egyptian history of Manetho.

Ptolemy III (of Egypt). [Surnamed Euergetes, meaning "Benefactor"; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (246–221 B.C.); son of Ptolemy II, whom he succeeded in 246 B.C. He was born c282 B.C., and died 221 B.C. To avenge the murder of his sister Berenice in a dynastic intrigue, he invaded (c245) Syria and captured Babylon, but was recalled in 243 B.C. by a revolt in Egypt. He expanded the Egyptian fleet and gained control of the eastern Mediterranean, and further extended his domain by his marriage to Berenice of Cyrene.

Ptolemy IV (of Egypt). [Surnamed Philopator, meaning "Father-loving"; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (221–203 B.C.); son of Ptolemy III. He was born c244 B.C., and died 203 B.C. He defeated Antiochus the Great at Raphia in 217 B.C., but in general he was an ineffective ruler; he held his throne by murdering several near relatives.

Ptolemy V (of Egypt). [Surnamed Epiphanes, meaning "Illustrious"; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (203–181 B.C.); son of Ptolemy IV. He was born c210 B.C., and died 181 B.C. His dominions were overrun by Antiochus III, who had agreed to divide the Egyptian possessions with Philip V of Macedon, and saved only by the interference of Rome. He married Cleopatra, daughter of Antiochus, in the winter of 193–192 B.C., in accordance with a treaty of peace concluded with Antiochus some years previously. The Rosetta Stone commemorates his assumption of his majority in 196 B.C.

Ptolemy VI (of Egypt). [Surnamed Philometor, meaning "Mother-loving"; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (181–145 B.C.); son of Ptolemy V. He was born c186 B.C., and died 145 B.C. The early years of his reign were a regency under his mother. He was captured during an invasion of Egypt by Antiochus IV, King of Syria, in 170 B.C., whereupon his younger brother Ptolemy VIII proclaimed himself king. He was presently released by Antiochus, and for a time reigned conjointly with his brother. Expelled by his brother, he sought relief in person at Rome in 164 B.C., and was reinstated at Alexandria, his brother being forced to retire to Cyrene, which he was allowed to hold as a separate kingdom. He supported Demetrius II in the struggle in Syria against Alexander Balas and was killed in the battle near Antioch that saw Demetrius' final triumph.

Ptolemy VIII (of Egypt). [Surnamed Euergetes (and called Ptolemy Euergetes II) or Physcon, meaning "Potbelly"; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (170–116 B.C.). He was born c184 B.C.; and died 116 B.C. He was a younger brother of Ptolemy VI, on whose death in 145 B.C. he usurped the throne, putting to death the legitimate heir Ptolemy VII (surnamed Neos Philopator), and marrying the widowed queen, his sister. (For history previous to this event, see Ptolemy VI). He was expelled from Alexandria by the populace, who supported his wife, in 130 B.C. but recovered his capital in 127. His very evil reputation is probably due to his usurpation of the throne, the murder of the prince, and his later murder of his son by his sister, who would have succeeded him, and thus is well-founded. He married (c130 B.C.) his wife's daughter by her first husband, Ptolemy VI.

Ptolemy IX (of Egypt). [Surnamed Lathyrus or Soter, meaning "Savior," "Preserver"; called also Ptolemy Soter II; Latin Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (116–81 B.C.); son of Ptolemy VIII. He died in 81 B.C. On the death of his father he ascended the throne conjointly with his mother, Cleopatra. He was, in 108 B.C., expelled from Egypt by Cleopatra. He succeeded, however, in maintaining himself in Cyprus, which he held as an independent kingdom until the death of his mother in 88 B.C., when he was recalled by the Alexandrians. They had in the meantime expelled his brother, who had reigned as Ptolemy X.

Ptolemy X (of Egypt). [Called Ptolemy Alexander I; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (108–88 B.C.); brother of Ptolemy IX; died 88 B.C. He was made joint ruler with his brother, and after his expulsion (108 B.C.) ruled alone. After his mother's death, he was attacked and deposed by Ptolemy IX, and was killed fighting against his brother in Cyprus.

Ptolemy XI (of Egypt). [Called Ptolemy Alexander II; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (80 B.C.); son of Ptolemy X. He ruled after the death of his uncle, Ptolemy IX, having married the widow of his predecessor through the offices of the Roman Sulla. Ptolemy very shortly thereafter killed her and was murdered himself by an outraged mob (80 B.C.).

Ptolemy XII (of Egypt). [Surnamed Neos Dionysus or Auletes, meaning "Flute-player"; Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (80–51 B.C.); illegitimate son of Ptolemy IX. He died 51 B.C. He succeeded to the throne on the extinction of the legitimate line of the Ptolemies in 80 B.C. He was expelled by the populace in 58, but was restored by the Romans in 55 B.C.

Ptolemy XIII (of Egypt). [Latin, Ptolemaeus.] King of Egypt (51–47 B.C.); son of Ptolemy XII; died 47 B.C. He ascended the throne conjointly with his sister Cleopatra, whom he expelled in 49 B.C. The reinstatement of Cleopatra by Caesar in 48 B.C. gave rise to war. Ptolemy was defeated on the Nile, and was drowned in the flight.

Ptolemy XIV (of Egypt). King of Egypt (47–44 B.C.); brother of Cleopatra; died 44 B.C. For political reasons Julius Caesar had Cleopatra marry her adolescent younger brother, but she had him killed in order that her son by Caesar, Caesarion, might reign as Ptolemy XV.

Ptolemy (of Mauretania). King of Mauretania and last of the Ptolemaic line; son of Juba II and grandson of Antony and Cleopatra. He was summoned to Rome and put to death by Caligula (40 A.D.), whose cupidity had been excited by his great wealth.

Ptolemy. [Full Latin name, Claudius Ptolemaeus.] Alexandrian astronomer, geographer, and mathematician; born at Alexandria; fl. in the first half of the 2nd century A.D. His influence extended to the 17th century and was second only to that of Aristotle. His astronomical system is strictly geocentric: the sun, planets, stars, and heavens revolving about the earth; though it requires an intricate system to support his theory, the theory explains the phenomena Ptolemy knew. The Copernican system superseded it (16th and 17th centuries) because it was simpler, not because the Ptolemaic system was proved false. His greatest work, the Mathematike Syntaxis or Megale Syntaxis (Great Collection), summed up the achievement of Greek astronomy to his day; translated into Arabic (the Almagest), it greatly influenced Arab astronomical thought. He elaborated trigonometry to accommodate astronomy as a mathematical discipline, and catalogued 1028 stars. In his Geographical Treatise he first technically used the terms "parallel" and "meridian." He adopted Posidonius' incorrect estimate of the circumference of the earth; his overestimate in the extent in longitude of Eurasia was one of the factors of Columbus' discovery. Other works of which the Greek originals have not been recovered have survived in Arabic or in Latin translation. His recorded observations (at Canopus) extended from 127 to 151 A.D.

Ptoüs (tō'us). In Greek legend, a son of Athamas and Themisto, who gave his name to Mount Ptoüs in Boeotia. Near the mountain was a sanctuary of Ptoan Apollo. The oracle of the sanctuary never lied, and had the capability of answering in whatever tongue a question was put to it. During the Persian War Mardonius sent an envoy to consult the oracle and the answer was given, to the surprise of the Thebans who accompanied the Persian envoy, in Carian, the language of the envoy.

Publicola (pub-lik'ō-lā). Name given to Publius Valerius, legendary Roman statesman and general of the 6th century B.C., who was renowned for his eloquence and his generosity. He was one of several prominent citizens who sought to throw off the harsh rule of the Tarquins, and helped Lucius Junius Brutus to drive them out following the rape of Lucretia, wife of Tarquinius Collatinus, by the son of Tarquin the Proud. Following their expulsion, the Romans decided not to entrust their affairs to one leader but to divide the rule between two consuls. Valerius fully expected to be chosen as one of the consuls for his aid in driving out the Tarquins, and withdrew from public affairs in disappointment when Collatinus was chosen instead as the colleague of Brutus. However, he was one of the first of the senators to take the oath against the Tarquins, and swore to defend Roman liberty with his sword.

Tarquin sent envoys from Gabii, whither he had gone for refuge, to treat with the Romans, but Valerius barred their admission to the city. Next, Tarquin sent to say he resigned all claim to the throne, and asked only that his treasure be sent to him, that he and his dependents might not be in want. The Romans decided to cast out the treasure with the tyrant and admitted envoys to collect and dispose of his effects. The envoys used their time in Rome to conspire against the Republic. They met with members of the Aquilii and Vitellii families and wrote letters to Tarquin outlining a plot to kill the consuls and restore him as ruler of Rome. Some say they bound themselves to secrecy by drinking the blood of a human sacrifice. By chance, Vindicius, a slave in the house of the Aquilii, overheard their plot. Fearing that the consuls, both of whom were related to members of these two houses, would not believe him, he chose to go to Valerius, who was noted for his availability and for his justice. When Valerius heard of the plot he rushed to the house of the Aquilii with trusted aides and found the letters of which Vindicius had informed him. While he was still in the house the Aquilii returned and set upon him, but he successfully fought them, twisted their gowns around their necks, and dragged them to the Forum. Valerius produced Vindicius, an accusation was lodged, and the letters of the plotters were read. Among the conspirators were two sons of Brutus. Brutus handed them over to the lictors who put them to death for their crime against Rome; then Brutus withdrew from the Forum. Collatinus, the other consul, would have restored Vindicius to his masters and allowed the conspirators to depart from Rome. Valerius opposed him. He sent for Brutus, who returned to the Forum and called on the Roman people to pass judgment on the other conspirators; for, he said, he had already passed judgment on his own sons. The people put the matter to a vote and condemned the conspirators, and they were executed on the spot. Collatinus resigned the consulship and withdrew from the city. Valerius was elected consul in his place (509 B.C.). Vindicius was freed and made a citizen, the palace of Tarquin was razed and the Campus Martius, on which it stood, was rededicated to the god Mars.

However, Tarquin had not given up his intention of regaining power in Rome. He received aid from the Tuscans and approached Rome with a great force. The consuls led the Roman troops against them. Brutus and Aruns, son of Tarquin, killed each other in the battle; both sides sustained such losses that each thought itself defeated. The Romans were thoroughly disheartened. Valerius was uncertain what to do. In the night a divine voice issued from a nearby grove and proclaimed, "The Tuscans have lost one more man than the Romans." This inspired the Romans and discouraged the Tuscans, most of whom thereupon withdrew; those who remained were taken prisoner by the Romans. When the dead were counted, it was found that there was one more Tuscan corpse than Roman. Valerius returned to Rome in a chariot drawn by four horses, pronounced the funeral oration of Brutus and buried him with honor, and was himself honored with a triumph. With the death of Brutus Valerius was the sole ruler, and soon the Romans complained that he exercised kingly power and lived royally in a palace on the hill. Informed of these criticisms, he hired workmen and ordered them to demolish his palace during the night. The Romans were pleased that he heeded their criticisms, but were saddened by the loss of so fine a palace; and they were ashamed that Valerius had no place to live but was compelled to go about from house to house among his friends. They gave him a piece of ground and built him a new, less magnificent, house. Sensible of their fear of tyrants, he gave up many of the trappings of power, but such was the force and charm of his personality that the people obeyed him without question and he actually increased his personal power. To strengthen the Republic he brought the Senate, reduced in numbers by the Tarquins, up to strength. He promulgated liberal laws and revised the tax laws to make them more equitable and less onerous. To guarantee the public funds, he made the temple of Saturn the treasury and gave the people the right to elect two treasurers, or quaestors. And lastly, he ceased to rule alone: Marcus Horatius became his fellow consul. For his justice, his service to the Republic and to the Roman people, he was named Publicola, "The People's Respectful Friend."

Before Tarquin's second war against Rome, a prodigy occurred that greatly heartened the Romans. While still king he had begun the temple of Capitoline Jupiter, and had ordered artists of Veii to make a terra-cotta chariot to be placed atop it. Although he was driven out of Rome before the temple was completed, the artists went ahead and molded the chariot and set it in the fire to harden, whereupon it swelled to such a size that they could hardly withdraw it from the kiln. Soothsayers said this meant success for the people who possessed the chariot, and the Tuscans refused to give it to the Romans. Shortly afterward, in the course of games at Veii, the winner of the chariot-race was driving out of the arena. Suddenly his horses bolted, and in spite of his efforts to control them, they carried him off to Rome. The people of Veii were alarmed at this, and ordered the Tuscan artists to give up their earthen chariot to the Romans. Meanwhile, Tarquin had found assistance with Lars Porsena of Clusium, the most eminent and the most powerful ruler of Italy. He declared war on Rome and marched toward the city. Publicola, who was consul again, marched out to meet him. In the following battle Publicola received so many wounds he had to be carried from the field. The Romans retreated in dismay within their walls, leaving Horatius Coclès, with Titus Herminius and Spurius Lartius, to resist the Etruscans at the bridge-head. Horatius valiantly held back the Etruscans until the bridge behind him was destroyed, then leaped into the Tiber and swam to the city. The Etruscans laid siege to Rome. Publicola was eager to treat with the Etruscans but Tarquin arrogantly refused to have anything to do with him. This angered Lars Porsena. The Etruscan leader, it is said, was impressed by Mucius Scaevola, who secretly entered the Etruscan camp and, when caught, held his hand in the fire to demonstrate the valor of the Romans. Lars Porsena agreed to a parley with the Romans and peace was made. The Romans gave ten young men and ten virgins to the Etruscans as hostages; among the latter was Valeria, daughter of Publicola. One day the maidens were bathing in the river. Cloelia, one of them, swam across to freedom and urged the others to do the same. When his daughter appeared to him, Publicola was angry at the violation of the Roman pledge, and immediately returned her and the other maidens to the Etruscan camp. In the peace treaty, Lars Porsena showed great magnanimity to the Romans, who sent him a throne decorated with ivory as a token of their gratitude.

At a later time, many women of Rome were afflicted by a strange disorder; their children were either still-born or born deformed. Publicola consulted the Sibylline Books, sacrificed to Pluto, restored certain games, and, the gods being thus appeased, the unusual births no longer occurred.

Altogether, Publicola was consul four times. He won Appius Claudius, a powerful Sabine ruler, to the side of Rome. He gave him, and the 5000 men he brought with him, land in Rome, made them citizens, and gave Appius a seat in the Senate. The other Sabines considered Appius a traitor. They marched to Fidenae and prepared an ambush against the Romans. Publicola learned of it and put the Sabines to rout, and was honored with a triumph. He died soon afterward, full of years, greatly honored and loved, and having seen his work for the establishment of the Republic prosper. He was buried at the public expense in the city, an honor awarded only to those who had performed great services for their country, and was mourned by the women of Rome for a year.

Publian Laws (pub-lil'i-an). In Roman history: 1) A law passed c471 B.C., through the efforts of the tribune Publius Volero. It transferred the election of tribunes from the centuries to the comitia tributa (q.v. under Comitia), and its passage marked the concession of the right of initiating legislation to the plebeians. 2) Laws proposed by Publius Philo c339 B.C. They provided that one censor must be a plebeian; that the plebiscita (laws passed by the comitia tributa) should apply to all citizens; and that laws presented to the centuries should be previously approved by the curiae (q.v. under Comitia).

Publius (pub-lil'i-us). [Surnamed Syrus, meaning "the Syrian."] Latin writer of mimes; fl. in the 1st century B.C. He was born in Syria and was brought to Rome in his youth as a slave. He so charmed his Roman master by his intelligence and wit that he freed him and gave him a careful education. Publius wrote mimes, short farcical presentations, and acted in them, winning great applause by the pieces themselves, his acting, and his clever improvisation. His works contained many pithy sayings that were later incorporated in the works of other writers and are the only examples of his work that survive. "Beneficium accipere, libertatem est vendere." (To accept a favor is to sell one's liberty.) "Necesse est multos timeat, quem multi timent." (He must fear many, whom many fear.) These are among the sayings of Publius that have been preserved in a collection called Sententiae (Aphorisms).

Pudicitia (pū-di-si'shi-a). In Roman mythology, the personification of Modesty or Chastity.

Punic Wars (pū'nik). [Also: Carthaginian Wars.] Three wars waged (264–241 B.C.; 218–201 B.C.; 149–146 B.C.) between Rome and Carthage, resulting finally in the total destruction not only of Carthaginian power, but also of Carthage itself. The First Punic War began in 264 B.C. Its nominal cause was the interference of the Romans in behalf of the Mamertines who were under siege at Messana (now Messina), Sicily, by Hiero of Syracuse.

Its actual cause was the inevitable, and irreconcilable, friction between the growing commercial ambitions of Rome, and the established position of Carthage as the chief trading community of the Mediterranean. The leading events were the following: naval battles of Mylae and Ecnomus; unsuccessful invasion of Africa by Regulus; battles of Panormus and Drepanum; campaigns of Hamilcar Barca (father of Hannibal) in Sicily; Roman naval victory (ending the war) at the Aegates (Aegadian Isles, now the Egadi Islands) in 241 B.C. By the peace, Carthage ceded western Sicily and paid a large indemnity. The seat of war was Sicily, Africa, and the Mediterranean. The Second Punic War began in 218 B.C. Its immediate cause was Hannibal's conquest of Saguntum (an ally of Rome) in 219 B.C. It was carried on in Spain, Italy, Sicily, and Africa. The following were the leading events: Hannibal's invasion of Italy after crossing the Alps in 218 B.C.; battles of Ticinus, Trebia, Lake Trasimenus, and Cannae; campaigns in Spain; conquest of Syracuse by Marcellus; invasion of Italy by Hasdrubal, defeated at the Metaurus; final defeat of Hannibal at Zama in 202 B.C. By the peace, 201 B.C., Carthage ceded possessions in Spain and the Mediterranean and paid a heavy tribute, Numidia became an ally of Rome, and the Carthaginian fleet was reduced. The chief commanders were Hannibal for Carthage and the elder Scipio Africanus and Fabius Maximus for Rome. The Third Punic War began in 149 B.C. Its nominal cause was the attack by Carthage on Massinissa. Carthage was besieged by land and sea by the younger Scipio Africanus, and was taken and destroyed in 146 B.C. The city of Carthage was destroyed with a thoroughness which was to have few, if any, parallels until the 20th century, when improved weapons made wholesale destruction somewhat easier than it was for the Romans. The site of the city was plowed, some say, and salt was sown in the furrows, that nothing might ever grow there again. Carthaginian territory was divided between Rome and Numidia.

Pupillus (pū-pil'us), Orbilius. See Orbilius Pupillus.

of Pozzuoli about seven miles W of Naples; commercial center for Rome's eastern trade and a fashionable villa resort. Founded by political refugees from the Greek island of Samos, c521 B.C., Puteoli became a Roman colony in 194 B.C. and developed into one of the greatest ports of Italy (it was the port of the town of Cumae), and a winter and seaside resort for wealthy Romans; it declined later in competition with the Roman port of Ostia. The site is noted for its Roman ruins, including harbor installations, amphitheater, houses, and temples (the so-called Temple of Serapis is really an ancient market-place).

Pyanepsia (pī-ā-nep'si-ā). In ancient Athens, an annual festival of Apollo, celebrated in the Attic month Pyanepsion (October-November). It had the character of a harvest feast, and was said to be called Pyanepsia from a dish of beans which was cooked and eaten at that time. As part of the celebration, an offering called the Eiresione was carried by a boy, both of whose parents were living, to the temple of Apollo. It consisted of a branch of olive or laurel bound with white and purple wool and hung with offerings of fruit, cakes, and pots of olive oil, wine, and honey. The boy was accompanied by a procession, and a song, also called Eiresione, was sung. At the temple the branch was deposited as an offering to the god. Similar branches were hung before the doors of houses, where they remained until they were replaced the following year at the time of the festival. The Pyanepsia later came to be associated with vows made by Theseus. He was supposed to have returned from Crete to Attica on the eighth day of Pyanepsion and to have cooked the few remaining provisions in one pot to feed his hungry crew. Therefore, on this day the Athenians went to the shore and cooked beans in pots to honor his memory. The Pyanepsia also honored the Horae.

Pyanepsion (pī-ā-nep'si-on). The fourth month of the Attic year, corresponding to the last of October and the first of November. The feast of the Pyanepsia was held in this month.

Pydna (pid'nā). In ancient geography, a town in Macedonia, situated near the Thermaic Gulf, about 30 miles SW of Thessalonica. It is notable for the victory gained near it in 168 B.C. by the Romans under Aemilius Paulus over the Macedonians under Perseus, causing the overthrow of the Macedonian monarchy.

Pygmalion (pig-mā'li-on). In Greek legend, a son of Belus, a marvelous sculptor, and a king of Cyprus. According to some, he was disgusted by the evil lives he saw some women leading, and withdrew from the society of women, resolved to remain a bachelor. He made an exquisite ivory statue of an ideal maiden, more beautiful than any he had ever known, and as he gazed upon its loveliness he fell in love with the statue. At a festival in honor of Aphrodite he prayed the goddess to send him a maiden like the statue. As he prayed the flames of the altar leaped up to show that the goddess had heard him. When Pygmalion returned to his house he kissed and caressed the statue and was overjoyed to find that Aphrodite had indeed endowed it with life. The maiden, Galatea, and Pygmalion were married in the presence of Aphrodite and afterward had a son, Paphus, who name was sometimes given to the island of Cyprus. Other accounts say Pygmalion fell in love with Aphrodite herself, and made his wonderful statue when his love was rejected. But the goddess was pleased with his homage, and breathed life into the statue.

Pygmalion. Legendary king of Tyre. He was the brother of Queen Dido, and murdered her husband for his riches. He kept the deed a secret but Sychaeus, Dido's husband, appeared to her in a dream and told her what had happened, and warned her to flee. It was for this reason that Dido and her companions went to North Africa where they founded the city of Carthage.

Pygmies (pig'mēz). In Greek legend, a race of men whose height equalled one pygme, that is, the distance from the elbow to the knuckles, or about 13½ inches. Homer represents the Pygmies as dwelling on the southern shores of Ocean, and as being warred upon by the cranes in their annual migrations. The battle with the cranes started because once a beautiful Pygmy, Gerana, considered herself more beautiful than Hera and Artemis. As a punishment for her pride Hera changed her into a crane and caused her to be hated by her people. Heracles, as he was sleeping, was once attacked by Pygmies, but he laughed at them, gathered a few up in his lion's skin and took them to Eurystheus (or to Omphale). The African Pygmies described by Herodotus, and once supposed to be equally fabulous, were apparently the same as the remarkable race or races of dwarfs found by explorers in various parts of equatorial Africa.

Pylades (pil'a-dēz). In Greek legend, a son of Strophius, king in Phocis, and of Agamemnon's sister. When Orestes was brought to Strophius' court to protect him from the evil designs of Aegisthus, Pylades became his intimate and faithful friend. He accompanied Orestes when he returned in secret to Mycenae, and reminded him of the command of Apollo when Orestes wavered in his decision to kill his mother to avenge his father's murder. After the murder of Clytemnestra by Orestes the Furies pursued him. Pylades, disowned by his father for his part in the murder, refused to desert Orestes and accompanied him in his wanderings. He also went with him to Tauris to secure the sacred image of Artemis, although it was well-known that the Taurians sacrificed any strangers they caught landing on their shores. On his return from Tauris, Pylades married Electra, sister of Orestes. She bore him two sons, Medon and Strophius.

Pylae Ciliciae (pī'lē si-lish'i-ē). Latin name of the Cilician Gates.

Pylaemenes (pil-ē'mē-nēz). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a king of the Paphlagonians. He led his men to Troy as an ally of the Trojans in the Trojan War. He was slain by Menelaus.

Pylaeus (pil-ē'us). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a son of Lethus and the brother of Hippothous. He was a captain of Pelasgians, allies of Troy in the Trojan War.

Pylas (pī'las). In Greek legend, a king of Megara. Pandion the Younger fled to his court when he was driven out of Athens by his enemies. Later, Pylas left Megara because of a murder, and gave his throne to Pandion. Pylas went to Messenia, where he founded the city of Pylus. Neleus drove him out and took over the city, which thereafter became known as the home of the Neleids and of Nestor. Pylas went into Elis and founded another city, "sandy Pylus."

Pylia (pil'i-ā). In Greek legend, a daughter of Pylas, king of Megara. When Pandion the Younger fled to his court Pylas gave him

Pylia for wife. She bore Aegeus, Lycus, Nisus, and Pallas to Pandion.

Pylus (pī'lus). In ancient geography, a town in N Messenia, Greece, situated N and E of the Gulf of Navarino. The "sandy Pylus" of the Iliad and the Odyssey, it was about two and a half miles from the Bay of Pylus. (The bay has since been converted into a lagoon by a sandbar that blocks its mouth.) According to some accounts, this Pylus was founded by Pylas, who came into the region from Megara and whose companions were Leleges. It later fell into the hands of Neleus, who raised the city to such renown that Homer called it "the city of Neleus." Heracles captured Pylus from Neleus because the latter had refused to purify him for a murder. He gave it in trust to Nestor, the son of Neleus, because he was the only one of the sons of Neleus to receive him. This act by Heracles was the basis of the later claim of Cresphontes, one of the Heraclidae, to Pylus as part of the inheritance of the descendants of Heracles. In ancient times Pylus was a place of considerable importance. Nestor's palace was the peer, in size and wealth, of the palace of Agamemnon at Mycenae. Until 1939 the location of the palace of Nestor had been a matter of dispute; some placed it farther north, in Elis, and some placed it on the western promontory of the Gulf of Navarino that was known in ancient times as Coryphasium. In 1939 Prof. Carl W. Blegen, of the University of Cincinnati, located the palace of Nestor at Epano Englianos, a plateau about two and one-half miles from the modern village of Chora, when he and a Greek team uncovered the foundations and floor of the palace there. In 1952 and succeeding years, excavations under Prof. Blegen's direction have revealed the existence of a large palace dating from about 1300 B.C. Remains uncovered give a clear outline of the size and ground plan of the palace. Lying in a NW-SE direction on the plateau, the palace is roughly a huge rectangle that is divided lengthwise into three unequal parts. The central and largest portion is occupied, beginning at the SE end, by a portico, vestibule, great hall, and storage magazines. A narrow aisle on the southerly side has many small chambers. On the northerly side a wider aisle holds, from the southeast to the northeast, the queen's apartments, a bathroom, stairways to the upper floors, and more storage spaces. It is thought the palace had at least two stories, the walls of the first story being of soft limestone blocks, and those of the upper story being of crude brick. Fragments of pottery of all sizes and descriptions have been dug up. In one pantry alone, over 2800 drinking cups were found; these were shaped like champagne glasses, and the number of them was ascertained by counting the stems. The work of the excavators has revealed that the floors and walls of the palace were covered with plaster and decorated with paintings of dolphins, octopuses and other marine creatures, linear designs, floral patterns, winged griffins, and human figures in armor. The great hall, or throne room, was surrounded by an inside balcony from which the ladies, whose apartments were on the second floor, could observe the men. There was an intricate drainage system by which water from the roofs and terraces of the palace was collected and carried off by underground limestone conduits. A large, circular, decorated hearth was found in the throne room where, presumably, slices of bulls' thighs wrapped in fat were roasted when Nestor entertained. A smaller circular hearth was found in the queen's apartments. Fragments of terracotta chimney pots to carry off the smoke from the hearth fires have also been discovered. The remains of a bathroom, in which there was an unbroken tub, have also been found. In a wing connected to the palace by a kind of ramp, another tub has been located. A huge altar unearthed in a portico before this wing indicates that this area may have been the household shrine. One of the most important finds in the excavation of the palace was the discovery of what was apparently an archive room. In this were hundreds of clay tablets and fragments inscribed with the Linear Script B. These tablets were the first to be found on the mainland of Greece and prove that the Greeks had a written language at least as early as 1300 B.C. At the time the tablets were found the Linear Script B, so-named by Sir Arthur Evans who found it in Crete, had not been deciphered. It was at last deciphered in 1952. The inscriptions on the tablets list inventories of olive oil, wheat, figs, and other stores of the royal household, as well as accounts of work to be done and goods to be supplied to the palace. The palace was destroyed by fire, as indicated by the fused condition of the rocks, and the site was never again occupied, so that the outline of the original structure has not been confused by the remains of later buildings, as at Mycenae and Tiryns. In the neighborhood of the palace many tombs have been discovered, some of which have been excavated. In them were found swords with ivory handles, bits of gold leaf, small art objects, and other funerary offerings. Skulls have been found that may even be those of the heroes of Homer. The modern seaport of Pylos, on a promontory at the SE end of the Gulf of Navarino, is a town founded early in the 19th century. In the neighborhood is a vast cave, with oddly shaped rock formations. This is said to be the cave where the cattle of Neleus and Nestor were kept. Because the sandy soil, whence its name "sandy Pylos," was unfit for growing grass, the cattle were driven to this area for grazing and were sheltered in this grotto. The modern Pylos has also been called Navarino and Neocastro.

Pyraechmes (pir-ek'mēz). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a captain of the Paeonians, allies of the Trojans in the Trojan War. He was slain by Patroclus.

Pyramus and Thisbe (pir'a-mus, thiz'bē). In classical legend, two Babylonian lovers. They were forbidden to see each other by their parents, and talked together through a crack in the garden wall. They finally planned to defy their parents and to meet under a mulberry tree that grew beside the tomb of Ninus, outside the city walls. Their rendezvous was set for the hours of darkness. Thisbe was the first to arrive at the trysting place. As she waited for her lover she was frightened away when a lion, whose jaws were dripping with blood from a recent kill, came to drink at the spring nearby. She fled into a cave, dropping her veil as she ran off. The lion seized the veil and mauled it about so that it was daubed with blood and then loped off. Pyramus, who now arrived, saw the blood-stained veil and instantly concluded that Thisbe had been killed. In despair, because he had asked Thisbe to undertake the secret meeting and now felt himself responsible for the death of his love, he killed himself under the mulberry tree that was to have been the meeting place. After a time Thisbe dared return. She found Pyramus dying, and resolved that death should not separate them. She seized the sword with which Pyramus had slain himself and plunged it into her own breast. Ever after, the berries of the mulberry tree, which were originally white, ripened to a dark purple, in memory of the blood of Pyramus and Thisbe which was shed because of their love for each other, under its boughs.

Pyrene (pī-rē'nē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Bebrys, a king in the Pyrenees. Heracles ravished her when he visited her father's kingdom on his labor to fetch the cattle of Geryon. According to some accounts, she gave birth to a serpent. She fled from her father's anger and was killed by wild beasts. Heracles found her body and buried it. Some say that this princess gave her name to the range of mountains in which her father's kingdom was located: the Pyrenees.

Pyrene. In Greek mythology, mother by Ares of that Cycnus who fought with Heracles at the Echecorus River in Macedonia.

Pyreneus or Pyrenaeus (pī-rē-nē'us). According to legend, a Thracian warrior who seized the lands of Daulis and Phocis and made himself king. He saw the Muses on their way to their temple on Mount Parnassus and invited them to take shelter in his palace from a sudden storm. When the weather cleared and the Muses prepared to depart, Pyreneus barred their way and attempted to assault them. The Muses escaped from him by flying off. Pyreneus, maddened for his arrogance, sought to pursue them. In his madness he leaped from a tower and fell to his death.

Pyrgi (pir'jī). In ancient geography, a town of Etruria, situated on the coast W and N of Caere. It was celebrated for its rich temple of Leucothea which was plundered by Dionysius the Elder (384 B.C.).

Pyrgos (pir'gōs). [Also: Pirgos.] See Letrini.

Pyrigenes (pir-ij'e-nēz). An epithet of Dionysus, meaning "Born of" or "Amid Fire," because he was snatched from his mother's womb when she was destroyed by the blazing majesty of Zeus and his thunderbolts.

Pyriphlegethon (pir-i-fleg'e-thon). Another name for Phlegethon, the river of fire in the Underworld.

Pyris (pir'is). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a Lycian companion of Sarpedon. When Patroclus entered the battle to drive the Trojans back from the Greek ships, he slew Pyris.

Pyronia (pir-ō'ni-a). Epithet of Artemis, meaning "Fire-goddess." From the sanctuary of Artemis Pyronia on Mount Crathis, the Argives took fire for their ceremonies at Lerna.

Pyrrha (pir'a). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Epimetheus. With her husband Deucalion she survived the flood which Zeus sent to destroy the wicked race of man. In fulfillment of the instructions of an oracle, after the flood she helped to found a new race to repopulate the earth. See Deucalion.

Pyrrha. The name assumed by Achilles when, disguised as a girl, he was hidden in the court of Lycomedes on the island of Scyros by his mother Thetis. She sent him there in the hope that he would not go to Troy, for she knew that he was fated to die if he joined the Greeks in the fighting at Troy. Achilles was sometimes also known as Cercysera during the period when he was hiding in Lycomedes' court.

Pyrrhic (pir'ik). An ancient Grecian warlike dance, in quick and light measure, accompanied by the flute. It consisted chiefly in adroit and nimble steps and motions of the body, intended to represent the attempt to avoid strokes of an enemy in battle and to inflict injury upon him. It was performed under arms, and the movements and practice necessary were looked upon as training for service in the field.

Pyrrho (pir'ō). Greek philosopher; born in Elis c360 B.C.; died c270 B.C. He accompanied Alexander the Great on his eastern expedition then returned to Elis, where he lived in poverty, although highly honored by his fellow countrymen. The Athenians also honored him and gave him citizenship. He was the founder of the Skeptical school of philosophy.

Pyrrhus (pir'us). Another name for Neoptolemus, son of Achilles.

Pyrrhus. King of Epirus, and one of the greatest generals of antiquity; born c318 B.C.; killed at Argos, Greece, 272 B.C. He was the son of Aeacides, king of Epirus, and Phthia. His father claimed descent from Neoptolemus (also called Pyrrhus), son of Achilles. While Pyrrhus was still an infant the Molossians revolted, overthrew Aeacides, and killed his family and his friends. Pyrrhus was saved and carried off by loyal friends of his family. According to Plutarch, as the party fled before the Molossians they came to a raging river and had no means of crossing it. The people they saw on the other side could not understand their shouts over the roar of the flood. In desperation one of the party inscribed the name of the royal fugitive on a piece of bark, weighted it with a stone, and hurled it across the river. The men on the other side read it, understood the urgent need of the party to cross, hastily constructed a raft, and came over to fetch them. The first man who touched the bank happened to be named Achilles. He took young Pyrrhus in his arms and conveyed him to safety across the river. Pyrrhus was taken to the court of Glaucias, king of Illyria. King Glaucias hesitated to give him asylum, out of fear of Cassander, an enemy of Aeacides. As he pondered, so the story goes, the child crept to him and pulled himself to his knees by grasping the king's robe. Glaucias was moved to compassion and took the child into his own household and brought him up with his own sons until he was 12 years old. At that time Glaucias sent him back to Epirus at the head of an army and restored him to his throne. Some say, however, that Glaucias did not restore him with an army, but that he was recalled by the Epirotes. At the age of 17 he went to Illyria to attend the marriage of one of the sons of Glaucias. While he was gone the Molossians revolted again and set his cousin Neoptolemus on the throne. Pyrrhus went to Demetrius Poliorcetes, son of Alexander's general Antigonus, who was related to him by marriage. The successors of Alexander the Great were still struggling for control of his empire. Pyrrhus joined Demetrius and Antigonus against Lysimachus, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Cassander, and fought bravely at the battle of Ipsus, 301 B.C. Demetrius and Antigonus were defeated, and Pyrrhus went as a hostage to Ptolemy in Egypt. There he noted that Berenice, wife of Ptolemy, exercised great influence. He courted her and won her good will, and made such a splendid impression on Ptolemy that he was given his stepdaughter Antigone in marriage. Out of gratitude, he later named his first son Ptolemy, and named a city he founded in Epirus Bereniceis. Antigone secured men and money for him, and helped him to win back his kingdom (295 B.C.), the government of which he at first shared with the usurper, his cousin Neoptolemus. However, the divided rule was highly unsatisfactory to both parties. Partisans of Neoptolemus plotted to kill Pyrrhus. He was informed of the plot and forestalled the conspirators by killing Neoptolemus and making himself sole ruler. He was now in position to pursue his own ambitious plans. He first interfered in the affairs of Macedon, still at the mercy of those struggling to win control, and then seized the coast of Macedon and the regions of Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. He was persuaded to meet his opponents to discuss peace. When sacrifices were to be made preparatory to swearing to the peace, a boar, a bull, and a ram were brought forth as victims. The ram dropped dead. Soothsayers predicted that one of the three kings negotiating the peace would die, whereupon Pyrrhus refused to swear to the articles. Shortly after this Alexander, king of Macedon at the peace negotiations, was murdered by Demetrius, thus fulfilling the prediction. Demetrius made himself king of Macedon, and thus a rival of Pyrrhus who had resolved to win control of the unhappy country. Pyrrhus won victories, great renown for himself by his bravery, skill, and daring, and the admiration of the Macedonians he defeated, who compared him to Alexander the Great. In the meantime, Demetrius had gone into Epirus and was ravaging it. Pyrrhus returned, and under a truce kept much of the Macedonian territory he had won.

Pyrrhus devoted himself exclusively to military affairs. After the death of Antigone he took several wives, for political reasons, and did all he could to foster the warlike natures of their various sons. It is said that when one of the latter asked him to which of them he would leave his kingdom, he replied, "To the one who has the sharpest sword." He won great fame and devotion from the Epirotes, who called him "the Eagle." "If I am an eagle," he said, "you have made me one; for it is on your arms, as upon wings, that I have risen so high." He was noted as a beneficent prince, who was quick to forgive an injury and even quicker to repay a kindness. In 286 B.C. he embarked on a plundering raid into Macedon. Meeting no resistance, he advanced as far as Edessa (Aegae). Then Demetrius raised a force and he withdrew, losing a considerable number of his men to the harassing attacks of Demetrius on the way. Demetrius planned to win back Asia, but was unwilling to leave so dangerous an enemy as Pyrrhus behind him. For this reason he made peace with him. Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, kings respectively of Asia, Egypt, and Thrace, became alarmed at the preparations of Demetrius for war. They took up arms against him and urged Pyrrhus to do the same. Encouraged by a vision of Alexander the Great that came to him in a dream, Pyrrhus marched against Demetrius. He took Beroea on the Haliacmon River. Demetrius returned to drive him out, but the Macedonians went over to Pyrrhus; Demetrius, deserted by his army, disguised himself and fled. Pyrrhus won his camp without striking a blow. Lysimachus now arrived and demanded half the kingdom. Pyrrhus did not feel strong enough to defeat him and yielded to his demand. When Demetrius had been driven from Athens by Pyrrhus, Lysimachus felt strong enough to attack Pyrrhus. He attacked his camp at Edessa, cut off his supplies, and compelled him, through hunger, to retire to Epirus, thus ending his influence and power in Macedonia in the same year in which he had won it (286 B.C.) Now, says Plutarch, Pyrrhus might have enjoyed the peaceful possession of his own kingdom, but he had no talent for peace. The people of Tarentum, engaged in a war with the Romans, asked him to come and command them. He immediately envisioned a conquest of the western world and gathered his host. Plutarch quotes a supposed conversation between Pyrrhus and one of his most trusted lieutenants, Cineas. "Suppose," said Cineas, "that you conquer the Romans, what then?" He would go and conquer Sicily. "And supposing a successful conquest of Sicily." Next he would win Africa. "And after that?" He would settle back and enjoy peace and prosperity. "But," persisted Cineas, "you have that now. Why risk men, treasure, and the horrors of war for what you already have?" Pyrrhus could give no answer, which made him somewhat discontented with Cineas but in no way changed his mind. He set out for Italy with 3000 horse, 20,000 foot, 20 elephants, 2000 archers, and 500 slingers. On the way his fleet was scattered by a great storm. He reached Italy with a small number of horse, 2000 foot, and two elephants. At Tarentum he found the people frivolously dissipating their time and strength; he immediately and sternly organized them for the war they had asked him to command. He learned that the Roman consul, Laevinus, was approaching with a large army, and sent word to him that he would act as mediator between the Romans and the Greeks in Italy. Laevinus replied that he "neither accepted Pyrrhus as a mediator nor feared him as an enemy," and continued his march. Although all his forces had not yet arrived, Pyrrhus

resolved to act. He rode out to observe the Roman camp, and remarked with admiration that "the disposition of these barbarians has nothing of the barbarian in it." In the battle that followed at Heraclea (280 B.C.) Pyrrhus defeated the Romans, but lost many of his best men. He took the Roman camp and won many cities that had been allied to Rome. He advanced toward Rome itself and sent an embassy to the Senate, offering generous terms of peace. As the Senate considered whether to accept, Appius Claudius, who had built the Appian Way and had brought water from the Anio to Rome, had himself led into the Senate. He was blind, and now, he said, he wished he were deaf as well, so that he would not hear the Romans, who boasted that they could have defeated Alexander the Great, trembling before Pyrrhus who could not even hold Macedon. When he finished speaking the Senate voted for war, and sent word to Pyrrhus that when he had left Italy they would be glad to make a treaty of friendship with him; otherwise they would continue to fight him. The Roman Fabricius came to discuss ransom for the Roman prisoners and made a deep impression on Pyrrhus by his absolute refusal to accept any of the gifts offered him. Fabricius learned of a plot to poison Pyrrhus, and warned him of it. In gratitude, Pyrrhus freed the prisoners without ransom. When the Romans again rejected his peace offers he attacked at Asculum in Apulia, on the slopes of the Apennines. A fierce battle raged, which was ended by the coming of night. The next day on ground suitable for effective operation by his elephants, Pyrrhus drove the Romans back and defeated them (279 B.C.). In the two days Pyrrhus lost all his best officers and many men whom he could not replace. When he was congratulated on his victory he said, "Another such victory and we are done!" (Whence the expression "Pyrrhic victory.")

Following his victories in Italy, Pyrrhus was invited by the Greeks of Sicily to drive out the Carthaginians. He went to Sicily, drove back the Carthaginians, took the strongly fortified city of Eryx (Lilybaeum), and offered splendid sacrifices to Heracles and held games in his honor. The Carthaginians offered to make peace, but he sent the reply he had received from Rome: that he would make peace with them when they had withdrawn from the island. His ambition was to conquer Africa, and in a very high-handed way he began to levy men and ships, and lost the good will of the Sicilians. His plans misfired; Rome and Carthage joined to oppose him; he decided to go back to Italy (276 B.C.). On the way he lost part of his fleet to Carthaginian attacks, and when he landed in Italy he was harassed by the Mamertines. In an engagement he was wounded in the head. One of the Mamertines tauntingly called for Pyrrhus to come forth. He strode through his army, his head streaming with blood, faced the man who had taunted him, and clove his skull with his sword. The Mamertines were dazzled with admiration, and henceforward left him alone. Returning to Tarentum, he attacked the Romans at Beneventum and was defeated (275 B.C.). He now returned to Epirus, marched into Macedon and took all before him, winning Aegae, and the admiration of the Macedonians, many of whom flocked to his standard. At the request of a Spartan dissident he marched into the Peloponnesus, plundered Laconia, and prepared to take the city of Sparta, but failed and withdrew. However, his "hopes grew as fast as they were cut off" and he marched to Argos, harassed as he went by the Spartans. By treachery he entered Argos at night. In the darkness and confusion his soldiers scattered and fought to little purpose. At daybreak Pyrrhus was greatly disturbed to see an image of a bronze bull and a wolf fighting, for an oracle had said he would die when he saw a wolf encountering a bull. As he observed the turmoil in the city, and the fact that his elephants could not operate in the confined space, he decided to withdraw, and sent orders to his son Helenus to break down a part of the wall of the city to facilitate his exit. His order was misunderstood. Helenus drove into the city with his forces. The streets were jammed, those trying to get out were blocked by those forcing their way in. The elephants went mad and added terror to the confusion. One elephant, searching for his fallen master, trod frantically on all before him until he found his master's body. This he took up in his trunk and placed on his tusks, then bellowing furiously he trampled on all around him. Pyrrhus saw his position was hopeless. He removed his plumed helmet and gave it to a friend, then wheeled his horse and charged in among the enemy. He received a slight wound in the breast and turned to engage the man who had accidentally made the thrust. This man's mother was watching the battle from a nearby roof. Seeing her son in great peril she seized a tile from the roof, threw it with all her might, and struck Pyrrhus on the head. He fell from his horse unconscious. Argives who did not recognize him dragged him to a nearby porch. There one who had served under Antigonus recognized him and drew his sword to cut off his head, but as he raised his arm Pyrrhus opened his eyes and gave him such a fierce look that he wavered, and succeeded in only wounding the fallen general on the face. After many blows, he hacked off his head. Alcioneus, son of Antigonus, rode up and asked for Pyrrhus' head. He took it to his father and flung it at his feet. Antigonus struck him for an impious barbarian and then, grieving for the changes Fortune brings to men, wept for his grandfather Antigonus, killed at Ipsus, 301 B.C., and for his father Demetrius, who had died in prison. He clothed the body of Pyrrhus in rich garments and put it, with the head, on a funeral pyre and burned it with due honor. The life of Pyrrhus was studded with possibilities. He might have made Epirus a formidable kingdom. He might have arrested the expansion of Rome and won Sicily from the Carthaginians. Instead, when he left Italy he remarked prophetically, "What a battleground I am leaving to Rome and Carthage." Hannibal is said to have ranked Alexander the Great as the world's greatest general, and Pyrrhus next to him.

Pythagoras (pi-thag'ō-ras, pī-). Greek philosopher and mathematician; born in the island of Samos; died at Metapontum in Magna Graecia, c497 B.C. Some say he was a follower of Pherecydes of Syros, and that he made extensive journeys in the earlier part of his life to study the civilizations of the East, especially that of Egypt. As an exponent of oligarchy he left Samos, c530 B.C., to escape the tyrant Polycrates, and went to Italy where he settled at Croton. Here he founded an ascetic brotherhood, governed by strict rules, which had as its aim a moral and religious reformation of mankind, as well as the political purpose of supporting aristocracies against democracies and tyrannies. Basic to their system was the Pythagoreans' belief in the transmigration and purification of the soul. Pythagoras himself, it is said, claimed that his body was inhabited by the soul of Euphorbus, a Trojan who wounded Patroclus at the siege of Troy. Because they believed that the soul migrates, not only from man to man but from man to animal, the Pythagoreans did not eat meat. Around the religious and moral facet of the Pythagorean system there soon grew up a suffocating tangle of superstition. Another basic principle of the Pythagoreans was a belief that the explanation of the physical and spiritual world depends on number. Pythagoras wrote nothing, but many works were attributed to him, and it is almost impossible to distinguish between his own theories and those formulated by his followers. However, it was due to Pythagoras that mathematics was raised to the rank of a science, and many early geometrical discoveries have been ascribed to the Pythagorean thinkers. They are considered to have founded the theory of numbers, and the mathematical study of acoustics and music. They have appeared to have been among the first (if not, in each instance, demonstrably the very first) thinkers to conceive of incommensurable quantities, and of the earth as a globe. Their emphasis on the study of numbers led on the one hand to number mysticism (which is what many modern readers now chiefly associate with Pythagoras and his school), and on the other hand to a quantitative study of nature. The brotherhood of the Pythagoreans in Croton rapidly increased, and for a time had great influence, which was wielded in political as well as spiritual affairs. In a war between Croton and Sybaris, a neighboring city ruled by a tyrant, the Pythagoreans won a decisive victory over the Sybarites (510 B.C.), and so completely destroyed their city, which had become proverbial for its wealth and luxury, that the exact site of the ancient city remained unknown until recently. Shortly afterward there was a reaction against the Pythagoreans. A number of them who had assembled in the house of Milo in Croton were destroyed when the house was set afire by their enemies. A wave of persecution broke out, and Pythagoras retired to Metapontum, where he ended his days.

Pythagoras. Greek sculptor, born in the island of Samos. He went to Rhegium, in Italy, where he was active in the first half of the 5th century B.C. He worked exclusively in bronze and rivaled his contemporaries, Polyclitus and Myron, in his statues of heroes and victors in the games. His statues, only one copy of which survives, were notable for lifelike play of the sinews and positions of the body.

Pytheas (pith'ē-as). Greek navigator and astronomer; fl. second half of the 4th century B.C. He was a native of Massilia (Marseilles), and visited the coasts of Spain, Gaul, and Great Britain. His works, only fragments of which remain, contain our earliest first-hand information concerning northwestern Europe.

PYTHIA ON THE ORACULAR TRIPOD
Red-figured Greek vase

Pythia (pith'i-a). The priestess who was said to hold communion with Apollo and receive his oracles in the inner sanctuary of the great temple at Delphi, throughout historic antiquity.

Pythiad (pith'i-ad). A period of four years between two consecutive celebrations of the Pythian games.

Pythian Games (pith'i-an). One of the four great national festivals of ancient Greece. They ranked next in importance to the Olympic Games and were celebrated in August, every four years. They were held at Delphi until 586 B.C., when they were transferred to the plain below Delphi; ultimately, a stadium was built on a ledge of the mountain above the sanctuary of Apollo. Before 586 B.C. the games were held every eight years, and consisted of a great festival in honor of Apollo (whence their name, from "Apollo Pythius," slayer of Python), in which the contests were of a musical nature. The contestants played hymns of praise to Apollo, accompanying themselves on the cithara (a stringed instrument of the lyre class), under the supervision of the priests of Delphi. After 586 B.C., athletic contests similar to those of the Olympic Games were added, but the principal interest of the Pythian Games continued to be the musical competition. In this cithara players and flute players, accompanied by singers, performed songs and hymns on the theme of Apollo's battle with the Python at Delphi, and his victory over the monster. The winners in the various divisions of the competition were awarded a wreath of bay leaves from the Vale of Tempe and a palm branch. Like the Olympic Games, the Pythian Games probably lasted until 394 A.D., when they were abolished by Theodosius.

Pythias (pith'i-as). See Damon and Pythias.

Pythius (pith'i-us). In Greek religion, an epithet or surname of Apollo in reference to him as the slayer of Python. Apollo Pythius was worshiped especially at Delphi.

Pythius. According to Herodotus, a Lydian who lived in Celaenae. He is said to have given Darius the Great a golden plane tree and a golden vine. When Xerxes came to Celaenae in his preparation for invading Greece, Pythius entertained him lavishly and offered him money for the prosecution of the war. Xerxes was amazed, and asked the extent of his wealth. Pythius replied that he had 2000 talents of silver, and just 7000

short of 4,000,000 gold darics, all of which he would gladly give to Xerxes, as he would still be rich from the produce of his great land holdings. Xerxes was greatly charmed by the offer of Pythius, and by the reception, so different from others he had received, given him and his army by Pythius. Not to be outdone in generosity, he not only declined to accept Pythius' money but gave him 7000 gold darics, so that he would round out his 4,000,000, and declared himself a friend of Pythius. At the time when the army of Xerxes prepared to leave Sardis for Abydos, the sun was suddenly darkened in midday, says Herodotus. Pythius was frightened by this evil omen. He went to Xerxes and asked a boon. Xerxes promised to grant whatever he asked. At this Pythius reminded the king that he had five sons who had been called into service in the army of Xerxes, and asked that Xerxes allow the eldest son to remain behind with his father. Xerxes was angered by his request as much as he had earlier been charmed by his generosity. He declared that his own relatives and friends were being called on to risk their lives and now, as he had earlier matched the generosity of Pythius with greater generosity, so he would match his insolence in making such a request with greater insolence. He would spare Pythius and four of his sons because of the entertainment Pythius and offered his army, but he ordered his minions to find the eldest son of Pythius and cut him in two. The two halves of his body were to be placed at either side of the road, that the army of the king might march between them as it left Sardis.

Pytho (pī'thō). Another name for Delphi. It is derived from "Python," the monster that guarded the shrine until it was killed by Apollo.

Python (pī'thon). In Greek mythology, a huge female dragon or serpent born from the mud of the Flood. She guarded the cave and chasm at Delphi and there was killed by Apollo, who thus became henceforth the possessor and motivating deity of the oracle at Delphi. A ritual drama representing the killing of the dragon by the god was annually reenacted there. Also, in classical antiquities and in the New Testament, a soothsaying spirit or demon; hence, also, a person possessed by such a spirit; especially a ventriloquist. Some ancient writers speak of the serpent Python as having delivered oracles at Delphi before the coming of Apollo, and during the Roman imperial period we find the name often given to soothsayers. The spirit was supposed to speak from the belly of the soothsayer, who was accordingly called a ventriloquist.

Pyxis (pik'sis). In ancient Greece, a type of cylindrical vase or box with a cover, used especially by women, as for the toilet.

Quadi (kwā'dī). Ancient Germanic tribe, a part of the Suevi, the eastern neighbors of the Marcomanni in Bohemia. The Quadi were originally allies of the Marcomanni, but later (in the 4th century A.D.) appear in incursions into Roman territory. They were ultimately included under the common name Suevi.

Quadrantaria (kwad-ran-tā'ri-ā). A disparaging nickname of Clodia, the profligate aristocrat, sister of Clodius and contemporary of Catullus and Cicero. The insinuation contained in the name is that she sold her favors for a trifle, the quadrans being a small coin, a farthing. In one version, a lover, taking leave of her embraces, presented her with a bag of coins, which on examination turned out to be quadrantes. (JJ)

Quadriga (kwad-rī'gā). A two-wheeled chariot drawn by four horses, which were harnessed all abreast. It was used in racing in the Greek Olympic Games and in the Circensian Games of the Romans.

Quadrigarius (kwad-ri-gā'ri-us), Claudius. Roman annalist; fl. at the beginning of the 1st century B.C. He wrote a history of Rome from the destruction of the city by the Gauls (c390 B.C.) to his own time c80 B.C. Fragments of his work survive.

Quaestor (kwēs'tor). In ancient Rome, a member of one of two distinct classes of magistrates: 1) One of two public accusers (quaestores parricidii) whose duty it was to lay accusations against those guilty of murder or other capital offense, and to see to the execution of the sentence. This magistracy was in existence at an early period and is mentioned in the Twelve Tables but became obsolete about 366 B.C., its functions being transferred to other officers. 2) One of the officers (quaestores classici) having the care administration of the public funds; a public treasurer. It was his duty to receive, pay out, and record the public finances, including the collection of taxes, tribute, etc. Quaestors accompanied the provincial governors, proconsuls, or praetors, and received everywhere the public dues and imports, paid the troops, etc. After Julius Caesar, some of their functions were given to the praetors and some to the aediles. The number of quaestors was originally two, but was gradually increased to 20. Under Constantine the quaestor sacri palatii was an imperial minister of much power and importance.

Quintilian (kwin-til'yān). [Full Latin name, Marcus Fabius Quintilianus.] Roman rhetorician; born at Calagurris (Calahorra), Spain, c35 A.D.; died c95 A.D. He was educated at Rome, returned to his birthplace as a teacher of oratory, and went back to Rome with Galba in 68, and taught oratory there for 20 years in a school which he opened in the reign of Vespasian. He was patronized by Vespasian and Domitian, and was given the rank of consul by the latter for his services in educating his grandnephews. His most celebrated work is his Institutio Oratoria, which exerted a powerful influence in its day. It is the most elaborate ancient treatise on education, as well as one of the most important ancient documents of literary criticism.

Quirinal (kwir'i-nal). [Latin, Mons Quirinalis.] Farthest north and the highest of the seven hills of ancient Rome, lying NE of the Capitoline and NW of the Viminal. It takes its name from an old Sabine sanctuary of Quirinus.

Quirinalia (kwir-i-nā'li-a). In ancient Rome, a festival in honor of Quirinus, celebrated on Feb. 17, on which day Romulus was said to have disappeared in a thunderstorm.

Quirinus (kwi-rī'nus). The name given to the deified Romulus. It was also sometimes applied to Augustus, and sometimes to the Roman nation.

Quirites (kwi-rī'tēz). An ancient division of the Sabines, especially of those who lived near and around the city of Cures. Numa Pompilius, the second king of Rome (715-673 B.C.), came from Cures. His people were amalgamated with the Romans, and all came to be called Quirites in their civil capacity. The name Quirites pertained to them in addition to that of Romani, the latter designation having application in their political and military capacity.

Rabirius (rā-bē'ri-us), Caius. Roman poet of the age of Augustus. Fragments of an epic on the wars between Mark Antony and Octavian (Augustus) are attributed to him.

Rabirius was condemned, but before the decision could be ratified by the people, Quintus Metellus Celer, the praetor, dissolved the assembly.

Rabirius, Caius Postumus. Nephew and adopted son of Caius Rabirius. He was defended successfully by Cicero (54 B.C.) when Gabinius brought charges of extortion against him. Cicero's speech (Pro Rabirio Postumo), used for his defense, survives.

Ramnes (ram'nēz) or Ramnenses (ram-nen'sēz). One of the three tribes into which the ancient Roman people were said to have been divided. Traditionally, this group represented the Latin element in the composition of the nation.

Raphia (rā-frī'ā). [Modern name, Rafa.] In ancient geography, a city on the coast of Palestine, SW of Gaza. Near it Ptolemy IV defeated (217 B.C.) Antiochus III.

Raudian Fields (rō'di-ān). [Latin, Campi Raudii.] In ancient geography, a noted plain in N Italy, probably near Vercelli, but by some located near Verona. It was the scene of a battle in 101 B.C., in which the Cimbri were annihilated by the Romans.

Raurici (rō'ri-si). [Also: Rauraci.] Ancient Germanic tribe, first mentioned by Caesar. They were situated in the neighborhood of Basel, on the upper Rhine in the territory north of the Helvetii, whom they had joined in their attempted migration, 58 B.C.

Raven. In Greek mythology, a bird sacred to Apollo. Originally its plumage was pure white, but in anger with the raven for bringing him the message that Coronis, one of Apollo's loves, had been unfaithful to him, Apollo changed the raven's feathers to black.

Ravenna (rā-ven'nā). City in N Italy, about six miles from the Adriatic Sea. It was probably founded by the Etruscans, and came later (c191 B.C.) into the hands of the Umbrians and the Romans, who developed it into the chief naval station on the upper Adriatic coast. The historical importance of Ravenna really begins in 404 A.D., when because of its defensibility and the protection of the fleet, the emperor Honorius (395– 425 A.D.) moved the imperial residence there.

Rea Silvia (rē'ā sil'vi-ā). See Rhea Silvia.

Reate (rē-ā'tē). [Modern name, Rieti.] In ancient geography, a town of C Italy, situated on the Velino River, about 42 miles NE of Rome, in a region celebrated by Vergil and Cicero for its fertility. The town was the chief town of the Sabines.

Reggio di Calabria (rād'jō dē kā-lā'brē-ā). See Rhegium.

Reggio nell'Emilia (nel-lā-mē'lyā). See Regium Lepidum.

Regillus (rē-jil'us), Lake. In ancient geography, a small lake near Rome (perhaps near Frascati). It is traditionally the scene of a victory of the Romans over the Latins c496 B.C. that gave Rome preëminence in Latium.

Regium (rē'ji-um). See Rhegium.

Regium Lepidum (lep'i-dum). [Modern names, Reggio nell'Emilia, Reggio, Reggio Emilia.] City in N Italy, supposed to have been founded by Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, c187 B.C., in the course of the construction of the Aemilian Way, on which it lies.

Regulus (reg'ū-lus), Marcus Atilius. Roman general; died c250 B.C. He was consul in 267 B.C., and as consul again in 256 during the First Punic War, he defeated the Carthaginian fleet at Ecnomus, invaded Africa, and defeated the Carthaginian army. The Carthaginians asked for peace, but Regulus laid down such harsh terms that they could not accept them and resolved to continue the war. In 255 B.C. the Carthaginians under the Spartan general Xanthippus defeated Regulus and took him prisoner. According to Roman tradition, after the Carthaginian defeat at Panormus by the Roman proconsul Metellus (250 B.C.), the Carthaginians sent Regulus, who had been held in captivity for five years, with an embassy to Rome to ask for peace or an exchange of prisoners. Regulus is said to have given his word that he would return to Carthage. When his embassy produced no results because he himself strongly advised the Senate not to accept the Carthaginian terms, he refused to follow the advice of friends who urged him to stay in Rome. Instead, he went back to Africa and was tortured to death. Later, Carthaginian prisoners who were handed over to his family were put to death with most cruel tortures. Some say the story of Regulus was afterward invented to justify the torture which his family had inflicted on the Carthaginian prisoners. In any case, the story of the honor and bravery of Regulus became a favorite with the Romans.

Remi (rē'mi). Tribe of the ancient Belgae in Gaul, dwelling in the vicinity of what is now Reims (their capital). They aided Julius Caesar in his Gallic wars.

Remus (rē'mus). In Roman legend, the twin brother of Romulus. It is said that when Romulus had plowed the magic furrow symbolizing the fortification of the future city of Rome, Remus contemptuously leaped over it, an act of desecration for which Romulus or his lieutenant killed him. See Pomoerium, Romulus. (JJ)

Res Gestae (rēz jes'tē). "Things accomplished, achievements," a term applied to official or unofficial biographies of kings and emperors, of which the Res Gestae of Augustus (the Monumentum Ancyranum) and of Charlemagne are the best-preserved examples. (JJ)

Resheph (rē'shef). In Syrian mythology, the god of war, disease, plague, and fire. The Phoenicians identified him with Apollo in his function of sender and dispeller of plagues. In Egypt Resheph was depicted as a bearded war-god bearing various weapons.

Rhadamanthys (rad-a-man'this). In Greek mythology, a son of Europa and Zeus, and the brother of Minos and Sarpedon. When Europa married Asterius, king of Crete, he adopted her sons and made them his heirs. The brothers quarreled over the youth Minotaurus. Minos drove the youth from Crete, Sarpedon fled, and Rhadamanthys made his peace with Minos, and on the death of Asterius received one-third of his kingdom. He was renowned for his wise and just rule, and established laws which were followed in Crete and in the Ionian islands. He obtained the laws from Zeus, who received him in a cave every ninth year. Rhadamanthys divided his kingdom among his sons and nephews. He fled from Crete to Boeotia, some say because he had killed a kinsman. There, according to some accounts, he married Alcmene, the mother of Heracles, after the death of Amphitryon. They lived in Ocalea and their tomb was shown in Haliartus. But some say he married Alcmene in the Elysian Fields. Zeus was devoted to Rhadamanthys and would have liked to spare him the burdens of old age. However, if he gave this blessing to one of his sons, the other gods might justifiably claim the same boon for their children, so he wisely gave up the idea. But he appointed Rhadamanthys as one of the three judges in the Underworld, where one of his special duties is to bring to justice those whose crimes have gone undetected on earth.

Rhadine (rad'i-nē). According to legend, a maiden of Samos who was compelled to marry a tyrant of Corinth, although she loved another. Her lover, Leontichus, followed her to Corinth in a cart; the tyrant seized him and killed him and Rhadine, and threw their bodies into the cart. Later he took pity on them and buried their bodies, so that their souls would not have to wander homeless for 100 years, as they would have done if they had not received proper burial.

Rhaetia (rē'shā). [Also: Raetia.] In ancient geography, a province of the Roman Empire. It was bounded by Vindelicia (at first included in it, but afterward made a separate province as Rhaetia Secunda) on the N, Noricum on the E, Italy on the S, and Helvetia on the W, corresponding to the modern canton of Graubünden, Switzerland, the N part of Tirol province, Austria, and part of the Bavarian and Lombard Alps. It was conquered by Tiberius and Drusus in 15 B.C., and was made a Roman province soon after.

Rhaetian Alps (rē'shān alps). [Latin, Alpes Raeticae.] Term of varied signification, applied in ancient times to the mountainous regions of Rhaetia, but in modern times generally to the chain of the Alps extending from the neighborhood of the Splügen Pass to the valley of the Adda, divided by the Engadine and Bergell into the Northern and Southern Rhaetian Alps. Peak elevation, Piz Bernina (about 13,295 feet), in the Bernina group.

Raetia Secunda (sē-kun'dā). See Vindelicia. Rhamnes (ram'nes). In Roman legend, a haughty Rutulian chief and prophet, favored by Turnus. He was slain by Nisus in the war between the Latins and Trojans.

Rhamnus (ram'nös). In ancient geography, a place in Attica, at the head of a wooded glen overlooking the Euripus, and not far from Marathon. There were two temples here:

one was a temple of Nemesis and the other, smaller one, was perhaps a temple of Themis. Nemesis was a goddess implacable to men of violence. Some say her wrath fell on the Persians who landed at Marathon (490 B.C.), and that she helped the Athenians defeat them because the Persians were so sure of defeating the Athenians that they brought marble with them to make a trophy. In her anger at their pride, Nemesis caused their defeat. Phidias used the marble they had brought with them to celebrate their victory to make a statue of Nemesis. On her head was a crown with deer and small images of Victory. In her left hand she held an apple branch; in her right, a cup engraved with figures of Aethiopians. On the pedestal of the image Helen was shown being led by Nemesis, said by some to be her mother, to Leda. The temple of Nemesis here was a Doric hexastyle peripteros, with 12 columns on the flanks, measuring 37 by 98 feet. The cella had pronaos and opisthodomos.

Rhea (rē'a). The great mother goddess; she was a Titaness, the daughter of Gaea and Uranus. She was the sister and wife of Cronus, and bore him Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, and Poseidon, for which reason she is often called the mother of the gods. Cronus seized each of his new-born children and swallowed them, because it had been prophesied that he would be dethroned by one of his sons. When it was time for Zeus to be born, Rhea fled to Mount Lycaeus, according to some accounts, and there in a spot where no shadow is cast gave birth to Zeus. She entrusted her infant to Gaea, who gave him to the nymphs of Crete. But some say Rhea bore Zeus in Crete, either in a cave on Mount Ida or on Mount Dirce. And some say that when she was bearing Zeus she pressed her fingers into the earth of the Cretan cave and that the Dactyls were generated by her fingers, five females from her left hand and five males from her right hand. Rhea wrapped a stone in swaddling clothes and presented it to Cronus, who swallowed it. According to some accounts, Rhea was also the mother of the Curetes, who guarded the infant Zeus in Crete. She assisted Zeus, when he was grown, to compel Cronus to disgorge his other children. Rhea purified Dionysus of the murders he had committed during his madness, and initiated him into her mysteries. As an emissary from Zeus she persuaded Demeter to make the earth fruitful again when that goddess, in despair over the loss of her daughter Persephone, had withdrawn her life-giving blessings and caused the earth to become barren. She also used her influence to persuade her son Hades to allow Persephone, whom he had carried off to the Underworld, to spend part of her time on earth. The cult of Rhea was associated with fertility rites. One of the oldest places of her worship was in Crete, where she hid the infant Zeus from Cronus. She was often associated with the great Asian mother goddess Cybele. The Romans identified her with their Magna Mater, or with Ops.

Rhea Silvia (rē'a sil'vi-a). [Also: Ilia, Rea Silvia.] In Roman legend, daughter of Numitor, king of Alba Longa, and a descendant of Aeneas. Her uncle deposed Numitor, killed her brother, and had Rhea Silvia consecrated as a vestal virgin so that she could not beget any heirs who would restore their grandfather. But Mars fell in love with her and visited her, and she bore him the twins Romulus and Remus.

Rhegium (rē'ji-um) or Regium. [Modern name, Reggio di Calabria.] In ancient geography, a city in Bruttii, S Italy, situated on the Straits of Messina, on the tip of the toe of the Italian boot. According to legend, Heracles came to Rhegium on his way back to Hellas with the cattle of Geryon. He lay down to sleep but was prevented from so doing by the noise of cicadas. He prayed to the gods to stop their noise. They heard his prayer, and from that day forward cicadas were never again heard in Rhegium. The city was founded by Greek colonists in the 8th century B.C. as a sister city to Zancle, and became an important port and prosperous city. It was allied to Athens by treaty (433 B.C.) and took part with Athens in action against Syracuse (427 B.C.) which was waging war on the Athenian ally Leontini, but in the later Athenian expedition against Syracuse (415 B.C.) Rhegium remained neutral. In 391 B.C. the city was besieged by Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, who not only wanted it for its dominating position on the straits, but also desired to punish Rhegium for an insulting refusal to give him a maiden of their city in marriage. At the time, the Italian cities came to the aid of Rhegium, and the siege was raised. Two years later (389 B.C.), in the continuing struggle with Dionysius, Rhegium was compelled to surrender her fleet, and in 387 B.C. he besieged the city. The inhabitants held out for ten months, when they were compelled by starvation to surrender. Those who could not raise the money to ransom themselves were sold into slavery. The city was soon rebuilt and its activity as a port revived. In 280 B.C. the city was seized and its male inhabitants massacred following the revolt of a Roman mercenary garrison that had been admitted within the walls during the invasion of Italy by Pyrrhus. In 270 B.C. the Romans successfully besieged it and freed it from the mercenaries. Rhegium remained a loyal ally of Rome throughout the Punic Wars. It kept its Greek character into the time of the Roman Empire.

Rhene (rē'nē). Named by Homer (Iliad) as the mother of Medon by Oileus, whose concubine she was. Medon was half-brother of Ajax the Less.

Rhenia (rē'ni-ā). In ancient geography, an uninhabited island near Delos, thought by some to be the island once known as Ortygia, where Artemis was born. The island served as a graveyard for the Delians, since no one was allowed to die or to be buried in the sacred island of Delos. When Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, captured Rhenia he dedicated it to Apollo and bound it to Delos with a chain.

Rhesus (rē'sus). According to some accounts, the son of Strymon, the river-god, and the Muse Calliope. Homer names him as the son of Eioneus. He was a Thracian king who came as an ally of Troy in the tenth year of the Trojan War. He arrived at a time when Hector had driven the Greeks back to their ships and Hector received him somewhat bitterly, accusing him of coming only when the Trojans were successful. Rhesus defended his delayed arrival on the ground that he had been fighting off his own enemies in Thrace. He promised to beat the Greeks once and for all the next day. On the night of his arrival he and his followers, who were encamped at some distance from the Trojans, were attacked by Diomedes and Odysseus. Those two Greeks had come as spies from the Greek camp. On the way they encountered Dolon, a Trojan spy, learned from him of Rhesus' arrival with his wonderful horses, and where he had pitched his tents. Diomedes and Odysseus then killed Dolon and proceeded to find Rhesus. They killed him and 12 of his followers as they slept, and captured his horses. It was important to the Greeks to capture the horses, as it had been prophesied that if they fed on Trojan fodder or drank the waters of the Scamander before Troy—which they had not yet done—the city could not be overthrown.

Rhesus. A Greek drama, attributed to Euripides. As the play opens, Hector, before his tent in the Trojan camp, bewails the setting of the sun that prevented him from burning the Greeks' ships. The fires he sees burning in the Greek camp convince him that the Greeks are about to flee as a result of the murderous attack he has made on them during the day. Aeneas does not agree that the fires are in preparation for departure. He persuades Hector not to attack, but instead, to send a spy to the Greek camp to learn their plans. Dolon, who volunteers to go as a spy on condition that he be awarded Achilles' immortal horses, dons a wolfskin for a disguise and, bragging that he will return with the head of Odysseus, departs. A messenger now announces the arrival of Rhesus, king of Thrace. Hector, who says he is a blunt man, tells Rhesus he should have come sooner. He owed his throne to Hector and should have come to his aid. Now, in their moment when victory is imminent, the Trojans don't need Rhesus. Rhesus justifies himself by saying that he had to fight off his own enemies, the Scythians, before he could come to Troy, but now that he has arrived he will make an end of the ten-year war in one day. He asks for the honor of fighting Achilles but on learning that he has withdrawn in anger from the war, he vows to capture Odysseus. Hector accepts his help and takes him off to his camp site.

Diomedes and Odysseus now enter, in search of Hector. They have already met and killed Dolon, as they themselves set out to spy on the Trojan camp. On finding that Hector is nowhere about, Odysseus suggests that they return to the ships, but Diomedes is unwilling to return without killing someone of their enemies. Athena now appears and tells them to slay Rhesus, never mind the others, as their fate is to die by other hands. They go in search of Rhesus. As they leave, Paris enters; Athena, pretending to be Aphrodite, assures him that she will protect him and Troy. Next Odysseus, pursued by sentinels, runs in, but he gives the watchword which he learned from Dolon, lulls the guard, and slips away.

The departure of Odysseus is swiftly followed by the entrance of a charioteer, wailing that Rhesus has been slain, and lamenting that he died as a fool might have done, without even the glory of fighting, but in his sleep. The charioteer, warned by a dream, woke up to find Rhesus and his followers dead. He thinks that Hector either committed the murder, or ordered it done to gain possession of Rhesus' horses. Hector, infuriated that two unarmed men had been allowed to escape, recognizes the raid as the work of Odysseus, and worries about Dolon who has not yet returned. As he waits, the muse, mother of Rhesus, appears in the heavens, bearing her son in her arms. He was slain by Odysseus, she says, and she curses Odysseus, Diomedes, and Helen, who caused the war. The muse tells how she was ravished by Strymon, the river-god, and in her shame left her son to be reared by nymphs. She had begged him not to go to Troy but he had disregarded her pleas and Athena had brought about his disaster. After predicting the death of Achilles, the muse, still with her slain son in her arms, disappears. Hector resolves to carry the fight to the Greek ships.

Rhesus. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a river near Troy which Poseidon and Apollo diverted from its course, after the Trojan War, and caused to turn against the wall which the Greeks had built to protect their ships. It raged nine days against the wall, with other rivers diverted for the same purpose, and washed the wall into the sea. Poseidon had complained to Zeus about the wall, saying that the Greeks had offered no hecatombs to the gods when they built it, and fearing that the great wall which he and Apollo had built for Laomedon would suffer by comparison with this man-made wall. It was then that Zeus promised him that the Greek wall would be destroyed. Zeus helped to destroy it by sending torrential rains during the nine days that the rivers were raging out of their courses against it. The other rivers that helped to destroy the Greek wall were the Aesepus, Caresus, Granicus, Heptaporus, Rhodius, Scamander, and Simois.

Rhianus (ri-ā'nus). Greek poet and Homeric scholar; born in Crete; fl. in the second half of the 3rd century B.C.; contemporary of Eratosthenes. He had been a slave and had served as an overseer of a palestra (a public exercise ground). He obtained an education, and at Alexandria studied and worked on various recensions of Homer. He wrote epigrams in the Alexandrine manner, and epics. The most celebrated of his epics was the Messeniac, in six books, about the Second Messenian War and the great deeds the hero Aristomenes performed during it. A few of the epigrams of Rhianus survive.

Rhigmus (rig'mus). In the Iliad, a son of Pires. He was a Thracian who allied himself with the Trojans and was slain by Achilles.

Rhithon (rin'thon). Greek poet of Tarentum; fl. c300 B.C. He was the son of a potter and is noted as the inventor of burlesque tragedy, called hilarotragedia, or cheerful tragedy. Into the tales of tragic myths he wove comic scenes. Fragments of his work survive.

Rhithonic Comedy (rin-thon'ik). Variety of ancient Roman comedy, named after Rhithon of Tarentum, a writer of travesties of tragic subjects. No specimens have survived.

Rhipaei Montes (ri-pē'i mon'tēz). Range of snowy mountains supposed by the ancient Greeks to be at the extreme north of the world. Their exact location was never agreed upon. As the area of the known world increased, they were pushed farther and farther north. They did not finally disappear from maps until the Renaissance.

Rhode (rō'dē). In Greek mythology, a nymph, the daughter of Poseidon and the nymph Halia. She was born on the island of Rhodes and was the mother by Helios of seven sons and one daughter. She is sometimes said also to have been the mother of Phaëthon.

the coast by a channel about seven miles wide. One of the Dodecanese Islands, it is about 45 miles long and about 545 square miles in area. The surface is mountainous and hilly. It is noted for its fertility and has an active commerce. The inhabitants are largely Greek. According to traditional accounts, Rhodes was first inhabited by the Telchines, who nursed the infant Poseidon there. When he grew up he fell in love with Halia, a sister of the Telchines, and by her had six sons and one daughter, Rhode or Rhodos. These six sons outraged the goddess Aphrodite and committed other evil deeds. To punish them, Aphrodite drove them mad, and Poseidon sank them under the ground. Some say that when Zeus was parceling out the lands to the gods he absent-mindedly forgot to award any to Helius, and when he thought of it, he was distressed. Helius offered to take an island that was just then rising from the great flood Zeus had sent over the world. Helius went there and found Poseidon's daughter Rhode, with whom he fell in love and for whom he named the island Rhodes. Thus, the island came to be known as "the Bride of the Sun." Rhodes is the scene of many myths and legends. Danaus, fleeing with his daughters from Egypt, stopped there and founded a temple of Athena at Lindus. Cadmus, searching for Europa, also touched at the island. He founded a temple to Poseidon in fulfillment of a vow he had made during a storm at sea, and also dedicated a bronze cauldron inscribed with Phoenician letters. According to some accounts, this was how the Phoenician alphabet was brought to the Greek world. Althaemenes, the son of Catreus of Crete, fled to Rhodes to escape an oracle that predicted he would kill his father. He built a temple to Zeus on Mount Atybrus, the highest point on the island, from which it was claimed he could see his beloved homeland. The flight of Althaemenes to Rhodes and his settlement there provide a legendary explanation for prehistoric colonization of the island by Cretans. Tlepolemus, the son of Heracles, also sought refuge on Rhodes, and became its king before he sailed to join Agamemnon in the war against Troy. His followers founded the three cities of Lindus, Camirus, and Ialysus and laid the legendary basis for the Dorian invasion of Rhodes about 1000 B.C. Some say that Helen, after the death of Menelaus, fled from Sparta because of the enmity with which she was regarded, and sought asylum in Rhodes with her former friend Polyxo, wife of Tlepolemus. But Polyxo now hated her because of the death of Tlepolemus in the Trojan War, and inspired her maids to hang Helen. At one time Rhodes was so infested by serpents that it was called "Ophidea." The inhabitants sent to the oracle of Apollo at Delphi for relief, and were told to admit Phorbas, son of Lapithes, to colonize the island. The Rhodians sent for Phorbas, who came with his companions and destroyed the serpents. After his death he was accorded a hero's honors by the grateful people. Some say the three chief cities of the island—Ialysus, Lindus, and Camirus—were named for three daughters of Danaus who died there. Others say they were named for three grandsons of Helius, and that they founded the cities after a great flood and divided the island into three parts, each of the cities being the center of the area which each of the brothers ruled.

In prehistoric times Rhodes was colonized by Phoenicians and Cretans, and later by Dorians, and its three cities formed, with Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and Cos, the "Dorian Hexapolis." At the beginning of the 6th century B.C. the island fell under the domination of the Persians. After the Persian War it joined the first Athenian Confederacy, 478 B.C., from which it withdrew by revolt at the end of the 5th century. In 408 B.C. Lindus, Ialysus, and Camirus founded the city of Rhodes on the NE tip of the island. The new city became the capital, replacing Lindus, and rapidly grew into a flourishing commercial, religious, and political center, thanks to its location and its wide commerce throughout the Mediterranean. The city later came under the influence of Sparta, from which it freed itself in 394 B.C. In 378 it entered the second Athenian Confederacy, from which it withdrew in 356 B.C. After the death of Alexander the Great, who had imposed a garrison on Rhodes as an ally of Persia against the Macedonians, the Rhodians allied themselves to Egypt and successfully withstood a year's siege by the

Macedonians. Following this success, Rhodes entered into relations with Rome, and it was in this period that it reached the height of its importance and influence. Its commerce was carried on throughout the Mediterranean world. The code of maritime law developed by Rhodes was so good that 300 years later the Emperor Augustus adopted it for his entire empire. The city became an outstanding artistic and literary center. Lysippus the sculptor made his famous Chariot of the Sun there, and a distinctive Rhodian school of sculpture developed that numbered among its members Chares of Lindus, who made the famous Colossus of Rhodes; Philiscus, author of a group of the Muses; Apollonius and Tauriscus of Tralles, who executed the famous statue of the Dirce group, the so-called Farnese Bull; and Athenodorus, Polydorus, and Agesander, creators of the massive Laocoön group. Aeschines, the Athenian exile, founded a school of rhetoric at Rhodes that was later attended by Cato, Cicero, Caesar, Brutus, and other Romans. Splendid examples of Mycenaean pottery, dating from the 10th century B.C. and earlier have been found at Rhodes, and a distinctive style of glazed vases decorated with deer, the lotus flower, palm trees, and geometric designs, was in full flower by the 7th and 6th centuries B.C. The island was wholly sacred to Helius. Chariot-races, athletic and musical contests were held annually in the summer at the festival celebrated in his honor. Four horses were hurled into the sea each year at the festival as a sacrifice to him. About 278 B.C. the colossal bronze statue by Chares of Lindus was erected to Helius. This Colossus, one of the Seven Wonders of the ancient world, stood on the breakwater which protected the harbor of the city of Rhodes. It stood until 224 B.C., when it was hurled down by an earthquake; its fragments were melted down in 656 A.D. Augustus recognized Rhodes as a city allied to Rome. The emperor Vespasian incorporated it into the Roman Empire.

Rhodius (rō'di-us). Named by Homer as one of the rivers of the Troad. The Rhodius, after the Trojan War had ended, was diverted from its course by Apollo and Poseidon and sent against the wall the Greeks had erected to protect their ships. The rivers so diverted from their courses, with the aid of Zeus, washed the wall into the sea. See Rhesus, river.

Rhodius, Apollonius. See Apollonius Rhodius.

Rhodope (rod'ō-pē). In Greek legend, a beautiful maiden skilled in hunting; she was a companion of Artemis. She incurred the wrath of Aphrodite by taking an oath to Artemis that she would eschew the society of men. To punish her for denying her power, Aphrodite caused her to fall in love with a hunter she met in a cave. Artemis, enraged in her turn at this violation of an oath, changed Rhodope into a spring in the cave. This spring came to be used as a test for virginity. A maiden whose virtue was in question was required to write that she was a virgin on a tablet and then, holding the tablet in her arms, to step into the spring. If her tablet expressed a lie the spring rose up to her neck and covered the tablet. If her tablet expressed the truth the water did not touch it.

Rhodope Mountains. Mountains of NE Greece, sacred to Dionysus. According to legend, Rhodope was the wife of Haemus, king of Thrace, who was changed into a mountain because she considered herself more beautiful than Hera.

Rhodopis (ro-dō'pis) or Rhodope. According to some accounts, a beautiful maiden whose sandal was carried off by an eagle while she was bathing. The eagle flew to Memphis and deposited the sandal with Psammetichus, the king. He regarded this as an omen, was enchanted with the beautiful sandal, and determined to find the owner. When he found Rhodopis he made her his queen. But others say that Rhodopis was a beautiful courtesan, a Thracian by birth, who was taken as a slave to Samos and thence to Naucratis in Egypt. She was ransomed for a vast sum by Charaxus, the brother of Sappho the poetess. She remained in Naucratis, became wealthy, and left as a memorial of herself a number of iron spits for roasting whole oxen. These she gave as a present to the shrine of Delphi.

Rhodus (rō'dus). In mythology, a son of Aphrodite and Poseidon.

Rhoecus (rē'kus). In mythology, a Greek youth who noticed that an oak tree was actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; đ as d or j, š as s or sh, ʈ as t or ch, ʒ as z or zh.

about to fall and propped it up. In so doing he saved the life of the dryad that inhabited the tree and won her gratitude. She promised to give Rhoecus whatever he asked as a reward. He asked for her love and she consented to give him this gift, telling him that she would send him a bee as a messenger with instructions. When Rhoecus departed he fell in with some companions and forgot all about the bee, so that when it came he impatiently brushed it away and injured it. In anger at Rhoecus for so quickly forgetting her and for injuring her messenger, the dryad blinded Rhoecus.

Rhoecus. Greek sculptor and architect; fl. c500 B.C. He was a native of Samos, where he built the famous temple of Hera, called by Herodotus one of the three greatest works of all Greece. Rhoecus was also supposed to have been the inventor of casting statues in bronze.

Rhoeo (rē'ō). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Staphylus and Chrysothemis. Apollo seduced her, and when her father discovered that she was with child he locked her in a chest and set her adrift on the sea. The chest was wafted to the island of Delos, or as some say, to the shores of Euboea. There Rhoeo's son was born. She named him Anius, because of the "trouble" he had caused her. He became Apollo's priest and king of Delos.

Rhoeteum (rē-tē'um), Cape. A promontory on the Hellespont where Telamonian Ajax was buried, and to which Thetis washed the arms of Achilles after Neoptolemus lost them in a shipwreck.

Rhoetus (rē'tus). According to some accounts, one of the giants who battled against the gods. He was hurled into Tartarus by Zeus.

Rhoxolani (roks-ō-lā'nī). See Roxolani.

Rhyton (rī'ton). In ancient Greece, a type of drinking-vase, usually with one handle. In its usually curved form, pointed below, it corresponds to the primitive cup of horn. The lower part of the rhyton is generally molded into the form of a head of a man or, more often, of an animal, and is often pierced with a small hole through which the beverage was allowed to flow into the mouth.

Rieti (rye'tē). Modern name of Reate.

Rimini (rē'mē-nē). Modern name of Ariminum.

Rion (rē-ōn'). See Phasis, river.

Robigalia (rō-bi-gā'li-ā). An annual festival in honor of Robigus and Robigo, supposedly instituted by Numa. The festival included a procession along the Via Claudia to the sacred grove of these two gods, about five miles outside Rome. The festival was held in April; prayers and incense were offered, a young dog and a sheep were sacrificed, and races were held.

Robigus (rō-bī'gus). In Roman mythology, an agricultural deity who protected growing grain from blight, or who was the personification of the blight. The female deity with the same function was Robigo.

Rodope or Rodopi (rod-ō'pē). See Rhodope Mountains.

Roma (rō'mā). In Roman legend, a daughter of Evander. According to some accounts, Evander founded Rome and named the city after his daughter. Roma came to be the personification of the city of Rome, and was worshiped as a goddess. During the reign of the Emperor Augustus, a circular shrine was raised on the Acropolis at Athens to the goddess Roma, where she was worshiped jointly with Augustus. The worship of Roma had begun as early as 195 B.C. In the 2nd century A.D. the Emperor Hadrian raised a temple to Roma and Venus. The figure of Roma appeared on the coins of the Roman Empire, where she was shown as a seated, robed figure, with a statue of Victory in her hand.

Roman Religion. The religious beliefs of the Italic tribes, of which Rome was a part, had a common origin with other Indo-European-speaking peoples who in prehistoric times began a series of migrations into Europe. However, from the 5th to the 1st century B.C., the only period for which reliable documentary evidence is available, the religion of the Italian people was already a composite of influences coming from the pre-Italic inhabitants—Etruscans (probably of Anatolian origin), Illyrians on the east coast, Greek colonists (and through them influences from the Near East), and trans-Alpine immigrants. In spite of these influences, a number of beliefs persisted which were genuinely native to the Romans and other Italians. The kernel of old Roman religion rested in the belief in impersonal spirits (numina) dwelling in some particular place or object. These numina, mostly concerned with the innumerable aspects of natural order, were thought to be present everywhere—in trees, stones, springs, groves—and to be able, if not properly placated, to inflict harm. This belief in impersonal spirits (that is, spirits which never attained the full personality of anthropomorphic gods) is reflected in the writings of such sophisticated poets as Ovid and Vergil. Ovid's description of the Aventine grove reveals this early stratum of Italic belief in nameless, awe-inspiring spirits: "There was a grove below the Aventine dark with the shade of holm-oaks, you might say, 'there is a spirit there (numen inest).'" We also hear of Ovid saying to his reader that Vesta, the hearth-spirit, should be considered "nothing more than the living flame." The same feeling of religious mystery, and fear, is found in Vergil's Aeneid (Book VIII) when Evander shows the site of the future city of Rome to Aeneas: "Hence he leads him to the abode of Tarpeia and the Capitol, gleaming now-a-days with gold, but once bristling with forest undergrowth. Even then the spot's dread awfulness brought fear to the timid countrymen; already they quaked before wood and rock." Evander continued: "This grove, this hill with its wooded top, some god, what god we know not, has for his dwelling." Hence, to the Roman, certain objects and places inspired in him a feeling of awe (religio) which compelled him to offer up prayers and sacrifices to these vague forces of nature in order to win their favor.

Greek contact with the Romans as far back as the 5th century B.C., and even earlier, resulted in the Italian deities' taking on certain attributes of their Hellenic parallels. Even among the early Italians certain greater personalized powers, such as Jupiter, Juno, and Diana, were sufficiently similar to some of the Olympian deities to be identified with them. In the course of time a number of Greek and Asiatic gods were introduced into Roman cult, some as new deities (as, Apollo, Cybele, Aesculapius), some under the names of nature gods with whom they were often identified in a superficial way (as, Demeter with Ceres, Aphrodite with Venus, Persephone with Libera). In this way the following major deities were established by analogy to the Greek form of religion:

Roman	Greek
Jupiter	Zeus
Juno	Hera
Neptune	Poseidon
Minerva	Athena
Mars	Ares
Venus	Aphrodite
Diana	Artemis
Vulcan	Hephaestus
Vesta	Hestia
Mercury	Hermes
Ceres	Demeter

After the Second Punic War, Greek ideas irresistibly made their way to Rome and it became more and more common to identify the gods of Rome with those of Greece. Thus the original significance of many Roman deities was either obscured or lost entirely. Under the influence of Hellenism, Roman gods became highly anthropomorphic. Statues of the gods in the forms of men and women were raised in the temples, and Roman writers, borrowing from the vast store of Greek myths, depicted their gods with all the moral weaknesses of men.

When the Romans prayed to the gods, they usually asked for material blessings rather than spiritual guidance. If examples of moral virtue were sought, they could be found in the lives of Roman soldiers and patriots, or in philosophy, which, like so many other things, was borrowed from the Greeks and adapted to Roman interests. Failure to receive help from the gods was taken to mean that the gods were angry with the petitioner. To regain favor, prayers and sacrifices were offered according to an exact ritual. If the favor was not granted the god had simply failed to fulfill his part of the agreement. The head of the family, the paterfamilias, could conduct his own religious services without the aid of an intermediary between himself and the deity to whom he addressed his prayers. However, prayers offered for the welfare of the state had to be offered in the most precise manner; they could not be left to any casual arrangement. Prayers and sacrifices on behalf of the state were placed in the hands of priests who were specially trained in the complicated rituals. A chief pontiff (Pontifex Maximus) and a kind of advisory board (collegium pontificum) assisted the chief magistrate in his sacral functions. Prayers and sacrifices for the good of the state were offered according to a ritual which, if not performed flawlessly, might result in being denied the favor of the gods. It was the function of the pontifices to know the proper religious course of action and the proper prayer-formula for regular festivals and for any religious crisis that might arise. They also had the duty of formulating the religious character of every day of the year, of keeping the knowledge of festival days throughout the year, and of seeing to it that they were duly announced to the people each month. There was no division between church and state, between civil officials and priests, for religious and political powers were one in the state. Civil officials were often members of particular priesthoods. In imperial times, the emperor himself took over the office of the chief pontiff. The Romans, believing that the gods were willing to express their approval or disapproval by signs, sought to know the will of the gods before undertaking any public action. Hence official diviners, called augurs, attempted to discover by the observation of signs, usually the flight or action of birds, whether the gods did or did not approve a proposed action. Predictions were also based on the observation of the entrails, especially the liver, of sacrificial animals by soothsayers (haruspices) who had inherited their skill from the Etruscans.

Rome was tolerant of religions other than her own, and even permitted the worship of foreign deities within the capital itself, though cults involving sensual or secret rites were at times forbidden. Adherents to Judaism and Christianity were excluded from this tolerance since the Romans regarded them as hostile to the gods of the state because of their obstinate refusal to offer incense on their altars. Fearing divine retribution for allowing such insults to the gods to go unpunished, and generally disliking anything resembling a secret society, the Romans persecuted Jews and Christians as subversives and enemies of the state. Roma Quadrata (rō'ma kwod-rā'ta). Earliest fortified Rome, occupying the Palatine Hill and a quadrangular enclosure surrounding its base. This oldest fixed area or pomerium was looked upon with reverence, and was marked by boundary stones as late as the empire.

Rome (rōm). City in C Italy, the capital and center of the Roman republic and empire of ancient times. It is situated on both banks of the Tiber River, about 15 miles from its mouth. Evidence exists of settlements on the site dating from c1000 B.C. The legendary date of the foundation of the city is April 21, 753 B.C., when Romulus, the first king of Rome, built his settlement on the Palatine Hill known as Roma Quadrata (Square Rome) because the fortifications of his settlement enclosed it in a square. To gain wives for his followers Romulus invited the Sabines to a celebration of sacred games and, in the midst of it, captured the women and drove off the men. The women brought about a reconciliation between the Romans and Sabines; the latter were united in one race with the Romans and took up settlements on the Capitoline and Quirinal Hills, the former of which was added to the city. The area between the Palatine and Capitoline served as a common Forum. Traditionally, the seven kings of Rome were: Romulus (753-715 B.C.); Numa Pompilius (715-672 B.C.); Tullus Hostilius (672-640 B.C.), who destroyed Alba Longa, joined the Albans to the Romans, and added the Caelian Hill to the city; Ancus Marcius (640-616 B.C.), who added the Aventine Hill, the Janiculum, and the port of Ostia; Tarquinius Priscus (616-578 B.C.), who laid out the Circus Maximus; Servius Tullius (578-534 B.C.), who added the Quirinal and Viminal Hills and, so some say, the Esquiline Hill also, and built the Servian Wall that enclosed all the seven hills of Rome; and Tarquinius Superbus (534-510 B.C.), who laid the foundations of the temple of Capitoline Jupiter, and who was expelled by Lucius Junius Brutus, the founder of the Roman Republic (509 B.C.). The early history of the Republic is one of almost continuous warfare with the various tribes of Italy and with the Gauls of the north. About 390 B.C. the Gauls, under Brennus, captured and burned the city. It was hastily rebuilt as soon as the Gauls were driven out. By 265 B.C., having defeated the Etruscan and Latin federations, the Samnite tribes, and the Greek cities in S Italy, Rome had become the ruler of Italy, which was ultimately linked to the city by a network of magnificent roads. Among the many splendid roads were the Appian Way (Via Appia), which ran south and terminated at Brundisium, the Flaminian Way (Via Flaminia), running northeast to Ariminum on the Adriatic Sea, the Aurelian Way (Via Aurelia), running northwest to Pisa and continued by Augustus into Gaul, and the Latin Way (Via Latina), which was an inland road that ran south and joined the Appian Way at Capua. Rome clashed with Carthage, the leading maritime power of the Mediterranean, in the three Punic Wars (264–241 B.C., 218–201 B.C., and 149–146 B.C.), and with the final defeat of Carthage became not only the dominant sea power in the Mediterranean, but also the most powerful state in the ancient world.

By 61 B.C., when Julius Caesar became propraetor in Spain, Rome held sway over all Italy, Narbonensis, all of Spain and Portugal except the north coast of the Iberian peninsula, North Africa from Carthage east to the Nile, Phoenicia, large areas of the Parthian empire, Media, Armenia, Pontus, Bithynia, much of Asia Minor, all of Greece, and the eastern shore of the Adriatic Sea. Under Caesar and, after the replacement of the Republic by the Empire, under Augustus, Trajan, and Hadrian, Rome became the capital of a dominion which encompassed at its height virtually all of the world as it was then known to most people: the entire Mediterranean basin; to the N, Gaul, Britain, and what was later to be W Germany and the Netherlands along the banks of the Rhine River; the Alpine countries; to the E the Danube basin down to the Black Sea, the Balkans, Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, and Palestine; the North African shore from Egypt to Morocco; and all of Spain and Portugal. The Roman legions were unquestionably the best disciplined and most effective major military force known in the world to that time. The fact that they did not penetrate to India, as did the army of Alexander the Great, is probably chiefly attributable to what was long a basic Roman strategic attitude toward its military efforts, namely that the legions should take, fortify, and hold territory, which would then be developed and colonized as integral portions of a single economic and (eventually) cultural unit. Compared to those of the early Roman emperors, Alexander's conquests were a brilliant military tour de force, but comprised an empire which it was far beyond actual Macedonian power to hold together. The Romans, who understood far better than anyone before them the logistic perils of too extended lines of communication, were not interested, for most of their history, in conquests which could not be consolidated and brought within the defensible empire. The existence of India and China was certainly known to the scholars and geographers of Rome under the emperors, but the thought of bringing them into the Empire was hardly one which would occur to leaders as shrewd and thrifty, in a military sense, as the early Roman emperors. It was during the period of early and middle Empire that the wealth of all these countries poured into Rome, and that the buildings which became the admiration of the centuries were erected.

Among the many existing remains of the Roman city are the Forum Romanum, with the arches of Titus, Septimius Severus, and Constantine, the Flavian Amphitheater or "Colosseum," Forum of Trajan, the temples of Concord, Fortune, Saturn, and Neptune, the Basilica of Constantine, the palace of Caligula, Christian and Jewish catacombs, and others; the Thermae (Baths) of Diocletian are near the Central Station; outside the old Servian Wall are the Theater of Marcellus, the well-preserved Pantheon, the Mausoleum of Augustus, and the Thermae (Baths) of Caracalla; the monument of Hadrian is on the right bank of the Tiber River.

Romulus (rom'ū-lus). In Roman legend, the founder of Rome (753 B.C.) and its first king (753–716 B.C.). Venus complained to Jupiter about the misfortunes that were overwhelming her son Aeneas on his flight from Troy. Jupiter assured her that he had not changed his mind about the destiny of the Trojans. He told her that after a 300-year reign by the descendants of Aeneas, twins would be born to a princess of Trojan blood and one of these twins would become the founder of an unlimited empire. Aeneas, too, was given a glimpse into the future

when he visited his father Anchises in the Underworld. The twins foretold by Jupiter were Romulus and Remus, the sons of Mars and the vestal Rhea Silvia, and thus grandsons of Numitor and descendants of Aeneas. Amulius, the brother of Numitor, had seized the throne. He now ordered the infant sons of his niece to be drowned, lest they grow up and avenge their grandfather. The babes were put into a chest and cast into the Tiber. But, under the protection of the gods, the chest floated down the river and was washed by a great tide up onto the banks near the Palatine Hill. There they lay under a fig tree. A she-wolf heard their cries and came and suckled them. Some say too, that a wood-pecker sent by Mars brought them food in its beak. The twins were found by a shepherd and brought up as his foster sons. Ultimately, Remus was brought before Numitor in some dispute and was recognized as his grandson. Romulus and Remus killed Amulius, restored Numitor to the throne, and went off to found a new city on the hills. Remus wanted to build the new city on the Aventine Hill. Romulus preferred the Palatine, the site of an ancient city of Trojan origin. A flight of birds favored the choice of Romulus and he immediately set to work to build the walls of his city. Remus, disappointed that his choice of a site had not prevailed, mocked the fortifications Romulus was building, and leaped scornfully over the walls. Romulus was infuriated and killed his brother. Romulus' settlement prospered but there were no women in the new town. Under the pretense of celebrating games, Romulus invited the Sabines to come with their wives and daughters for a festival. When the celebration was in full swing the young Romans seized the Sabine women and drove off the men. A war broke out which was settled at length by making the Sabines and the Romans equal in the new settlement. The new city, Rome, expanded and prospered under the wise rule of Romulus. At the end of his successful life Mars was permitted by Jupiter to descend from the heavens, in the midst of a fearful storm of thunder and lightning, and carry Romulus off in his chariot to the heavens. Thereafter he was worshiped as a god by the Romans, who gave him the name Quirinus and erected temples in his honor. His wife was spared the grief of losing her husband: she was carried off to the heavens on a star and became known as Hora.

Romus (rō'mus). In Roman legend, a son of Aeneas or of his son Ascanius. According to some accounts, Aeneas died in Phrygia and did not reach Italy at all. These accounts say that it was this Romus who went to Italy and founded Rome. Such accounts are, of course, completely at variance with the Aeneid.

Roscius (rosh'us), Quintus. Greatest of Roman comic actors; died c62 B.C. He was a native of Solonium, near Lanuvium, in Latium. He was presented by Sulla with a gold ring, the symbol of equestrian rank, and was the instructor and friend of Cicero, who defended him in a lawsuit.

Rosetta Stone (rō-zet'a). An inscribed stone found in 1799 by soldiers of Napoleon near the Rosetta Mouth of the Nile (whence its name). A decree of the priests of Memphis, of 196 B.C., honoring Ptolemy V Epiphanes (210-181 B.C.) for his benefactions was recorded on it in three scripts—Egyptian hieroglyphs, Egyptian demotic or cursive, and Greek. The hieroglyphic text is broken at top and sides, but the demotic and Greek texts are almost complete. In the hands of Champollion and other scholars the Rosetta Stone became the key to the decipherment of the hieroglyphic script and the eventual analysis of the Egyptian language, which had survived as Coptic. Ceded to the British in 1801, the Rosetta Stone is in the British Museum. (JJ)

Roxana (rok-san'a, -sā'na). [Also: Roxane.] Wife of Alexander the Great; murdered at Amphipolis, Macedonia, 311 B.C. She was a Bactrian princess, the daughter of King Oxyartes, and was married to Alexander in 327 B.C. Alexander took other wives, according to the Oriental custom he increasingly followed, perhaps with the view to linking the Barbarians more closely with their Macedonian conquerors. In 324 B.C. he married Statira, daughter of Darius III, at Susa. After his death Roxana, then carrying his child, sent for Statira, who did not know Alexander had died. With the help of Perdicas Roxana killed Statira and her sister, threw their bodies into a well, and filled it up with earth. At Babylon she bore Alexander's posthumous son, who was accepted by the Diadochi (Alexander's generals and successors) as co-king with Alexander's half-brother Arrhidaeus. Roxana went to Macedonia, where she sided with Olympias, Alexander's mother, against Cassander, and was put to death with her son by order of Cassander, 311 B.C.

Roxolani (roks-ō-lā'nī). [Also: Rhoxolani.] One of the main divisions of the ancient Sarmatian people, situated in the region of the Tanais (Don) River about the beginning of the Christian era. They made frequent attacks on the Roman provinces, but later, with other Sarmatian tribes, allied themselves with Rome.

Rubi (rō'bē). [Modern name, Ruvo di Puglia.] In ancient geography, a town of Apulia, SE Italy. Many ancient Apulian vases of the 5th-2nd centuries B.C. have been discovered here.

Rubicon (rō'bi-kon). In ancient geography, a small river in Italy, near Rimini. In the later Roman Republic it was the boundary between Italy proper and Cisalpine Gaul. The crossing of it by Julius Caesar, in 49 B.C., took place despite contrary orders to Caesar from the Senate, and signalized Caesar's irrevocable decision to proceed against Pompey, which meant civil war. From this event, the phrase "cross the Rubicon" has since come to describe any act or decision of irrevocable import. It has been identified with the Rugone, Uso, and Fiumicino rivers.

Rufia (rō-fyā'). See Alpheus River.

Rufus (rō'fus), Marcus Caelius. See Caelius.

Rufus, Publius Sulpicius. See Sulpicius Rufus, Publius.

Rugii (rō'ji-ī). Ancient Germanic tribe first mentioned by Tacitus. They were originally situated on the Baltic Sea, west of the mouth of the Vistula River. In the 5th century A.D. they appeared south of the Carpathians, where they are mentioned among the people in the army of Attila. They founded a kingdom on the Danube, including parts of Roman Noricum, which was overthrown late in the same century. They then joined the Ostrogoths (East Goths), with whom they subsequently disappear from history. With Jutes, Angles, Saxons, and possibly Frisians, they seem to have taken part in the conquest of Britain, where their name is preserved in Surrey (old English, Súthryge) and in Easry in Kent (Old English, Eást-ryge).

Ruinous Dream. In the Iliad, a dream sent by Zeus to Agamemnon which led the latter to believe that the opportunity had come to seize Troy at last, after nearly ten years of besieging it. The dream was sent by Zeus in fulfillment of his promise to Thetis to punish Agamemnon for his arrogant seizure of Achilles' captive Briseis. For in the struggle that followed as Agamemnon led his forces against Troy, Achilles refused to take part.

Rullianus (rul-i-ā'nus). See Fabius Maximus, Quintus.

Rullus (rul'us), Publius Servilius. Roman tribune of the people (63 B.C.). He sponsored a law for redistribution of lands to the advantage of the poorer citizens. Cicero made four speeches (three extant) against the measure, which was withdrawn, being obviously an attempt on the part of the party of Caesar to lay the onus of oppression on the aristocratic party.

Rumina (rō'mi-nā). In Roman mythology, a minor goddess associated with the suckling of infants, both human and animal. There was a shrine of Rumina at the foot of the Palatine Hill near the Lupercal, where milk, not wine, was offered. Here, under a fig tree, Romulus and Remus were said to have been suckled by the she-wolf.

Rumor. According to Homer, "Zeus' own messenger." Vergil says she was the last child of Earth, and was a sister of Enceladus and Coeus. She is a swift-footed, feathered monster with a sleepless eye under each feather; and for every eye she has a tongue, a voice, and an ear. Rumor terrorizes whole cities with mixtures of truth and falsehood. Rumor brought the story of Dido and Aeneas to the ears of Iarbas, her rejected suitor. He appealed to Zeus, with the result that a message was sent from Zeus ordering Aeneas to depart for Italy. It was Rumor again, who brought to Dido the dread word that Aeneas was preparing to depart in secret. When Aeneas had landed in Italy, Rumor spread the news that Latinus had been advised by an oracle to give Lavinia to a stranger.

ician, consul in 132 B.C. He is noted for the severity with which he prosecuted the followers of Tiberius Gracchus. He was subsequently brought to trial and condemned for persecuting them. In the meantime, he had suppressed a slave war on the island of Sicily in 131 B.C., and had organized the island as a Roman province.

Rusellae (rö-sel'ē). In ancient geography, a city of the Etruscan League, situated near the Umbro (Ombrone) River about six miles NE of what is now Grosseto. It was conquered (c300 B.C.) by the Romans. There are various remains of antiquity on the site.

Sabazius (sā-bā'zhūs). In Thracian and Phrygian mythology, a god partially identified by the Greeks with Zeus and with Dionysus. His worship, which was orgiastic, was closely connected with that of Cybele and Attis, and was introduced into Athens in the 5th century B.C. It was introduced into Rome, and flourished throughout Italy after the 2nd century A.D. Sabazius was primarily a god of agriculture and of the regrowth of vegetation. His symbol was the snake, and a golden snake was used in the celebration of his mysteries. When he was identified with Zeus or Jupiter his symbol was the thunderbolt.

Sabellians (sā-bel'i-anz). Ancient Italic people which included the Sabines, Samnites, Lucanians, Piceni, Vestini, Marrucini, Frentani, Marsi, Paeligni, and others. Their language was Oscan.

Sabine Mountains (sā'bīn). Range of mountains E of Rome, near the E border of Latium. It is a branch of the Apennines. The highest point in the range is about 4200 feet.

Sabines (sā'bīnz). [Latin, Sabini.] Ancient people of C Italy, who lived chiefly in the mountains N and NE of Rome. They were allied to the Sabellians, Umbrians, and Oscans, and the Samnites were probably descended from them. They were defeated by Rome in 290 B.C. and formed subsequently Ruteni (rö-tē'nī). Ancient tribe in S Gaul, occupying what later was Rouergue. Defeated by the Romans in 121 B.C., they nevertheless retained a degree of autonomy and were allies of Caesar in 52 B.C.

Rutuli (rö-tū'li) or Rutulians (-li-anz). In Roman legend, an ancient tribe of Latium, dwelling south of the Tiber, whose capital was Ardea. Their king Turnus was famous in connection with the legends of Aeneas, especially as a rival for the hand of Lavinia, and led the Rutuli to war against Aeneas and his Trojans when they landed in Italy.

an important ethnic element in the composition of the Romans. The so-called rape of the Sabine women is a notable incident in the legendary history of early Rome. (According to one account of it, Romulus invited the Sabines to a celebration of games, and the Roman youths utilized the occasion to carry off several of the Sabine women for wives.) The chief town of the Sabines was Reate (now Rieti).

Sabinum (sā-bī'num). Country villa of Horace, his "Sabine Farm," the gift of Maecenas, situated not far from Tivoli. It is celebrated in his poetry.

Sabinus (sā-bī'nus). In the Aeneid, a planter of vines. He was said to be the forefather of the Laurentes (Latins) and the founder of the Sabine race.

Sacae (sā'sē). [Also: Sakas.] Ancient nomadic people dwelling in C Asia near the sources of the Oxus (modern Amu Darya) and the Jaxartes (Syr Darya). They invaded India in the 2nd century B.C. and are regarded as probably having been one of a number of Scythian peoples.

Sacer (sā'sér), Mons. Latin name of the Sacred Mount.

Sacred Band. Band of 300 Thebans formed to take part in the wars of the 4th century B.C. against Sparta. The band was made of 150 pairs of devoted friends, sworn to protect each other and their country. The Sacred Band was especially distinguished at Leuctra in 371 B.C., and was destroyed by Philip of Macedon at Chaeronea in 338 B.C. Under Epaminondas the Sacred Band was organized into a flying wedge that spear-headed all attacks.

Sacred Mount. [Latin, Mons Sacer.] Hill about three miles NE of Rome, beyond the Anio (Aniene) River. It is noted in Roman history as the place of temporary emigrations of the plebeians, undertaken in order to extort civil privileges. The first (c494 B.C.) led to the establishment of the tribunate; the second (449 B.C.) resulted in the abolition of the decemvirate.

Sacred Nine. Poetic epithet of the Muses.

Sacred Wars. In Greek history, wars undertaken by members of the Amphictyonic League in defense of the shrine of Delphi. There were four of these wars: 1) In c600–590 B.C. (or 596–586), the Amphictyons overthrew Crisa and Cirrha. 2) Athens aided the Phocians in recovering Delphi, c448 B.C. 3) In 357–346 B.C., the Phocians, at first successful against the Thebans, Locrians, and others, were overthrown by the aid of Philip of Macedon, who joined the allies in 352 B.C. Phocis was replaced by Philip in the League. 4) In 339–338 B.C., the Amphictyons appointed Philip to punish the Locrians of Amphissa for sacrilege; his successes led to the union of Athens and Thebes against him and their defeat at Chaeronea in 338 B.C.

Sacred Way. See Via Sacra.

Sacred Way. Ancient road in Greece from Athens to Eleusis, starting at the Dipylon Gate and traversing the Pass of Daphne. Over it passed every autumn from Athens the solemn procession for the celebration in the shrine of the great Eleusinian sanctuary of the mysteries in honor of Demeter, Persephone, and Iacchus. For almost its whole length it was bordered with tombs and chapels. At the beginning of the road, in the area known as Ceramicus, a number of the tombs remain in place, practically uninjured. Further along the modern road to Eleusis, whose line is almost identical with that of the Sacred Way, many architectural fragments are still visible, and some can be identified from the descriptions of Pausanias. At one point on the road is the monastery at Daphne which exhibits, in contrast with its Byzantine architecture, some remnants of French Gothic work. It was founded by the French dukes of Athens, and contains their tombs, but occupies the site of a temple to Apollo. Further on, toward the Bay of Salamis, there are considerable remains of a sanctuary to Aphrodite.

Sacriportus (sak-ri-pōr'tus). In ancient geography, a locality in Latium, Italy, near Praeneste. Here Sulla decisively defeated (82 B.C.) the forces of the younger Marius.

Saepinum (sē-pī'num). [Modern name, Altilia.] Small place in C Italy about 20 miles N of Beneventum. The Roman walls of the ancient town remain practically perfect.

Sagitta (sā-jit'a). An insignificant but very ancient northern constellation—the Arrow—placed between Aquila and the bill of Cygnus. It is, roughly speaking, in a line with the most prominent stars of Sagittarius and Centaurus, with which it may originally have been conceived to be connected.

SAGITTARIUS

Saguntum (sa-gun'tum). [Modern name, Sagunto.] In ancient geography, a town in E Spain, situated near the Mediterranean Sea, about 15 miles N of what is now Valencia. A Roman theater and the ruins of an ancient citadel are preserved; there are scattered remains also from the Iberian, Carthaginian, and Moorish periods. The ancient town, according to legend founded by Greeks, actually is more likely to have been an Iberian town. Around 228 B.C. the town, disturbed by the growth of Carthaginian power, concluded an alliance with Rome. The Carthaginian leader Hannibal attacked the town in 219 B.C. and conquered it after a siege of eight months. The Romans rebuilt the town after 214 B.C., but it failed to regain its former importance.

Saitis (sa-i'tis). Epithet of Athena, from Sais, the Egyptian goddess with whom Athena was identified. Danaus is said to have raised a sanctuary of Athena Saitis on Mount Pontinus near Lerna, where the heads of the husbands his daughters had murdered were buried.

Salacia (sa-lā'shā). In Roman mythology, the consort and cult partner of Neptune. She was an ancient Italian goddess and is thought to have been the spirit of springing water. She later became identified with the Greek Amphitrite.

Salamis (sal'a-mis). In mythology, a daughter of the river-god Asopus and Metope. Poseidon fell in love with her and carried her off to an island in the Saronic Gulf. She bore Poseidon a son, Cychreus, who became king of the island, which was subsequently named Salamis in honor of his mother.

Salamis. [Also: Koulouri.] Island of Greece, in the Saronic Gulf, S of Attica and opposite the harbor of Athens. It is about ten miles long. The island was said to have been named for Salamis, daughter of the river-god Asopus. Her son by Poseidon, Cychreus, had been made king of the island for his service in slaying a serpent that was ravaging the land, at that time known as "the Serpent Isle." During the reign of Cychreus Telamon fled here when he was banished from Aegina for the murder of Phocus. Cychreus welcomed him and gave him his daughter in marriage. Later, some say, Cychreus became so cruel that he was expelled and went to Eleusis to become an attendant of Demeter, but the Salaminians founded a sanctuary of Cychreus and worshiped him as a hero. Telamon succeeded him on the throne. His son, Great Ajax, was born on the island, and from here he sailed in command of 12 ships to join the Greeks in the war against Troy. Near the harbor is the stone on which Telamon sat and watched his two sons, Ajax and Teucer, put out for Aulis to join the Greek fleet. The people of Salamis honored Ajax and his son Eurysaces, and in the temple of Ajax was an ebony image of him. In early times, Salamis was independent, and was contended for by the Megarians and Athenians; for whichever of the two cities controlled Salamis menaced the other city. Solon aroused the Athenians to "recover" Salamis. A force was organized, of which Pisistratus was one of the generals. Under his command, Nisaea, the Megarian port opposite Salamis, was taken. This was followed by the occupation of the island itself. The Megarians and Athenians made peace and agreed to submit their dispute to arbitration. The Spartans, called on to judge the merit of their claims, awarded the island to Athens (c596 B.C.) because of the connection of Cychreus with Eleusis, and also because of the lines in the Iliad that connect Salamis and Athens, they read:

Ajax from Salamis led his warships; twelve was number

Led them and stationed them where the Athenians stood in battalions.

After the destruction of Athens in the Persian War the Persian fleet of Xerxes assembled off Salamis, with the intention of engaging the Greek fleet. The Athenians had withdrawn to the island with their families before the Persian advance on Athens, and wanted to make a stand against them there. The Greeks of the Peloponnesus were reluctant to fight, as they thought, for the benefit of the Athenians, and preferred to protect the Peloponnesus by constructing a great wall across the isthmus. Themistocles, the great Athenian commander, feared that the vote in the assembly would go against his plan to fight at Salamis, and that the allies would elect instead to withdraw and defend the

Peloponnesus. He first threatened to withdraw the Athenian fleet and when that failed to change the plans of his allies, he resorted to stratagem. He sent a confidential messenger to the Persians to tell them that the Greeks were disorganized and in panic, as indeed they were, and to advise them that this would be the time to attack. The Persians promptly accepted the advice. They sent a force to occupy the island of Psyttalia, which lies between the jutting promontory of Salamis and the mainland, ordered their Egyptian allies to sail around Salamis and cut off a Greek retreat through the Bay of Eleusis, and moved their own ships in to block the Greeks behind the island of Psyttalia. While the Greeks, unaware of these maneuvers, were still disputing in council, Aristides arrived from Aegina and announced that it was now too late to argue, as they were surrounded. Themistocles had chosen the narrow waters of Salamis for the engagement with the Persians because it was best suited to the Greek ships, and in the narrow space the Persian ships would be at a disadvantage. In addition to his determination to protect Megara, Aegina, and Salamis, which would be abandoned if the Greeks withdrew to the Peloponnesus, he considered the strait of Salamis the ideal spot and opportunity for a decisive battle with the Persians. Demaratus, the Spartan king who had been exiled and who had fled to the court of Xerxes, accompanied him on his expedition into Greece. Some say that before the battle of Salamis he was walking with an Athenian exile in the plain near Athens. They observed a huge dust storm, raised as if by the feet of thousands of marching men, rising in the direction of Eleusis, and out of it they heard a great cry, like the cry given at the festival of Eleusis. Demaratus asked his Athenian companion what the dust and the cry could mean. The Athenian answered that it was a token of disaster for the forces of Xerxes, for as there were no men where the dust rose it must have come by divine means, and the cry was certainly a divine one; and since both came from Eleusis it was a message of good fortune for Athens. If the dust moved off in the direction of the Peloponnesus it indicated defeat for the land forces of Xerxes;

if it went toward the ships it indicated disaster for the fleet. As the two watched the dust formed a great cloud, rose in the air, and moved toward the ships. Now Demaratus and his companion knew that the fleet of Xerxes would suffer defeat, but they decided not to tell Xerxes of the omen, lest in his anger he cut off their heads. When the Greeks saw that they no longer had a choice they prepared for battle. At dawn, Sept. 20, 480 B.C., the Greeks put to sea in their fleet. The Persians attacked, and at once the Greeks started to back water as Themistocles had told them to do to lure the Persians through the narrow strait. Then one ship, either Athenian or Aeginetan, darted out from the line and attacked the enemy. As it was engaged the other Greek ships came to its aid and battle was joined. Some say that at this time a phantom in the shape of a woman appeared to the Greeks and cheered them on in a voice that was heard from one end of the line to the other, but first she rebuked them, saying, "Strange men, how long are you going to back water?" And some say that Cychreus appeared in serpent form during the battle and aided the Greek fleet. The Persians fought bravely, for Xerxes was watching the battle from the mainland, but their heavy ships were unable to maneuver in the narrow space, and those in the van who tried to withdraw were soon entangled with those that were eagerly forcing their way forward from the rear. By the end of the day a large part of the fleet was either destroyed or disabled. The Persians were compelled to withdraw to Phalerum, having suffered an overwhelming and decisive defeat. After the Persian War Salamis remained under Athenian control until it passed to Macedon in 318 B.C.; it was restored to Athens c230 B.C.

Salamis. In ancient geography, a city on the E coast of Cyprus, near what is now Famagusta. Teucer, the half-brother of Telamonian Ajax, was banished by his father on his return to Salamis from the Trojan War, because he had not brought back the bones of Ajax for burial. He sailed to Cyprus and was given permission to found a city, which he named Salamis after his homeland. In the Roman period the city was rebuilt as Constantia. Near it, a naval victory was gained (306 B.C.) by Demetrius Poliorcetes over Ptolemy I and his allies.

Salarian Way (sā-lār'i-an). See Via Salaria.

Salassi (sā-las'i). Ancient Ligurian (or perhaps Celtic) tribe which occupied the valley of the Duria Major, in NW Italy. They were in conflict with the Romans (143 B.C. and later), and were finally subdued in 25 B.C.

Salembria (sā-lem'bri-a). See Peneus.

Salentinum Promontorium (sal-en-ti'num prom-on-tō'ri-um). A Latin name of Santa Maria di Leuca, Cape.

Salerno (sā-lēr'nō), Gulf of. [Also: Gulf of Paestum; Italian, Golfo di Salerno.] Arm of the Mediterranean Sea, on the W coast of Italy, SE of the Bay of Naples.

Salernum (sā-lēr'num). [Modern name, Salerno.] Town in S Italy, situated on the Gulf of Salerno SE of Naples. It became a Roman colony in 194 B.C.

Salii (sal'i-i). Roman priests of Mars. They guarded the shield that fell from heaven, and according to tradition their order was established in the reign of Numa. They had charge of the sacred shields called ancilia, which they bore once a year in solemn procession through the city with hymns and dances.

Salina (sā-lē'nā). [Ancient name, Didyme.] One of the Lipari Islands, in the Mediterranean Sea about four miles NW of Lipari. Length, about six miles.

Salust (sal'ust). [Full Latin name, Caius Salustius Crispus.] Roman historian; born at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines, Italy, c86 B.C.; died c34 B.C. He was elected tribune of the people in 52. In 50 B.C. he was expelled from the Senate by the censors on the ground, according to some, of adultery with Fausta, the daughter of the dictator Sulla and wife of Titus Annius Milo, but more probably for political reasons, inasmuch as he was an active partisan of Caesar. He accompanied Caesar in 46 B.C. on his African campaign, at the conclusion of which he is said to have amassed a fortune by injustice and extortion. This fortune enabled him to retire from public life, as he was compelled to do on the death of Caesar, and to devote himself to the literary life. He also used it to lay out the magnificent pleasure ground, situated in the N part of Rome, E of the Pincian Hill, known as the Gardens of Sallust. He wrote Catilina or Bellum Catilinae, on the conspiracy of Catiline, and Jugurtha or Bellum Jugurthinum, on the war with Jugurtha, both of which are extant and show him to have been biased. His most important work was his Historiae, in five books, of which only fragments are extant. It contained a survey of ancient times, a brief description of the civil war between Marius and Sulla, and a detailed history from 78 to 67 B.C. Sallust modeled himself on Thucydides, in his attempt to present the truth and the causes of events, and in the use of speeches by the various men who shaped events, or were shaped by them, to reveal their characters and the general attitudes of the times.

Salmacis (sal'mā-sis). In mythology, a nymph of a fountain of the same name in Caria. She fell in love with Hermaphroditus, who had come to drink at the spring. He, a mere youth, rejected her advances, and begged her to go away and leave him alone. Salmacis withdrew into the forest but kept watch on Hermaphroditus. When he, tempted by the clear water, dived into the pool Salmacis dived in after him and clung to him. As he struggled to escape she prayed that he might never be separated from her. Her prayer was answered as their bodies were fused into one, neither completely male nor completely female. Hermaphroditus, realizing that he no longer existed as a man, prayed that whatever man bathed in that pool should emerge from it only half a man. This accounts for the tradition concerning the fountain in Caria of this name: that whoever drinks of it or bathes in its waters becomes effeminate.

Salmoneus (sal-mō'nē-us). In Greek mythology, one of the sons of Aeolus and Enarete. He left Thessaly and went to Elis, where he founded the city of Salmonia on the Enipeus River. His wife Alcidice died in giving birth to Tyro, a maiden of surpassing beauty. He next married Sidero, who ill-treated his daughter Tyro. Salmoneus was an arrogant and violent ruler, who considered himself godlike. In his insolence he imitated Zeus to such an extent that he confused himself with the god. He had a chariot so constructed, with bronze drums covered with hides, that there was a clangor as of thunder when he drove through the streets. On the festival day of Zeus he dashed through the streets in his thundering chariot hurling firebrands in imitation of the lightning, and calling on the people to worship him as Zeus the Thunderer. The vengeance of Zeus was swift. Real thunder roared and a bolt of lightning struck him dead and put the city in flames. He was hurled down into Tartarus, where Aeneas saw him when he visited Anchises in the Underworld on his way to Italy.

Salpinx (sal'pingks). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Trumpet." Athena was credited with having invented the trumpet. Hegeleos, grandson of Heracles, founded a temple of Athena Salpinx at Argos and taught the Dorians how to play the trumpet.

Salus (sā'lus). In Roman mythology, a goddess personifying health and prosperity, identified with Valetudo, with whom the Greek Hygea was identified. From 302 B.C. there was a temple to Salus, as the goddess who protected the welfare of the Roman people, on the Quirinal. The ancient attributes of Salus were ears of grain, pointing to an original agricultural function, which became lost in her aspect of health-giver. She was supplicated in times of epidemic and on the emperor's birthday.

Samarkand or Samarcand (sam-ār-kand'). See Maracanda.

Same (sā'mē). Another name for Cephallenia, an island in the Ionian Sea west of the Gulf of Corinth. Under this name it is mentioned in the Odyssey as the home of some of Penelope's suitors.

Samicon (sam'i-kon) of Samicum (-kum). In ancient geography, a city of Triphylia in Elis, Greece, situated on a high plateau of Mount Makistos. It was the meeting place of the six Minyan cities of Triphylia, and was noted for its temple of Samian Poseidon. Still visible are parts of the fortifications, built by the Eleans as a defense against the Spartans and Arcadians, probably in the 4th century B.C.

Samnites (sam'nīts). Ancient Italic people of Samnium, in C Italy. Their language was Oscan and hence they were culturally and linguistically close to the Sabellians. It is thought that the Samnites may have been descended from the ancient Sabines.

Samnite Wars (sam'nit). In Roman history, the wars between Rome and the Samnites. The First Samnite War (343-341 B.C.), broke out when Rome answered an appeal from Capua and other towns of Campania for aid against the Samnite hill tribes who were invading the lowlands of Campania. The war was concluded (341 B.C.) by a treaty with the Samnites, under which they withdrew from Campania and the towns of that lowland area put themselves under Rome's protection. The Second Samnite War (328-304 B.C.), erupted when the Samnites went to the defense of Palaepolis, which had been sending raiders into Campania and had drawn a declaration of war from Rome as a result. In the course of the war the Romans suffered a disastrous defeat at the Caudine Forks (321 B.C.) and were forced to agree to a humiliating peace. But as Rome continued to strengthen herself with allies the Samnites renewed the war, 316 B.C., to put an end to the increasing power of their enemy. The Samnites were joined in the last years of the war by the Etruscans, Umbrians, Marsi, Paeligni, and others. However, when the Romans invaded Samnite territory, and took their town of Arpinum, the Samnites concluded peace (304 B.C.) by renewing the former treaty with Rome. The Third Samnite War (298-290 B.C.) was caused by an attack of the Samnites on the Lucanians, Roman allies. Rome took the offensive and captured one Samnite stronghold after another. The Samnites found allies in the northern tribes, the Umbrians, Etruscans, and Cisalpine Gauls. The Roman consuls, Quintus Fabius Maximus Rullianus and Publius Decius Mus, marched at the head of four legions and defeated the Samnites and their allies at Sentinum after a desperate struggle in which Decius and 8000 Romans were lost. After this defeat the allies abandoned the Samnites, and although they continued the war alone for five more years their power was broken, and they were at last compelled, 290 B.C., to conclude a peace, by the terms of which they became allies of Rome.

Samnium/Samos

Samnium (sam'ni-um). In ancient geography, a mountainous district in C Italy. It was bounded by the country of the Marsi, Paeligni, and Frentani on the N, Apulia on the E, Lucania on the S, Campania on the SW, and Latium on the W, and was originally inhabited by the Samnites.

Samos (sā'mos). Island in the Aegean Sea, off the W coast of Asia Minor, from which it is separated by a narrow strait; colonized by Ionians, c1100–1000 B.C. The island, with an area of 181 square miles, is mountainous (highest point, 4725 feet), but has land of notable fertility. According to one tradition, Samia, daughter of the river-god Maeander, married Ancaeus the Less who accompanied Jason on the quest for the Golden Fleece, and who as king of the Leleges named his island kingdom for his wife. The Samians said that Hera was born on their island, near the Imbrasus River; and the willow tree under which she was born still stood in the sacred precinct and was shown to the traveler Pausanias in the 2nd century A.D. On the island, Zeus and Hera spent their wedding night, which lasted, some say, for 300 years. Samos was one of the chief seats of the worship of Hera, and one of her most ancient temples was here. It was raised, some say, by the Argonauts, and the ancient image within it was brought by them from Colchis. In the time of Herodotus the temple of Hera on Samos was the largest then known. Among the offerings in the temple was an embossed bronze bowl, sent by the Spartans as a gift to Croesus, king of Lydia. The Spartans claimed the Samians stole the bowl when the ship carrying it to Croesus touched at their port. The Samians said it arrived in their island after Croesus had been defeated by Cyrus, and that it was sold by the Spartans to some Samians, who then offered it to the temple. Amasis, king of Egypt, sent two wooden statues of himself to the temple, because of his friendship with Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. A linen corselet, in which were woven the figures of many animals and which was embroidered in gold and silver thread, was also dedicated in the temple. This was also a gift of the Spartans, but it had been intended for Amasis, and the Spartans said the Samians stole it. Mandrocles, a Samian engineer, built a bridge across the Bosphorus for Darius when he was preparing to march against Thrace. Darius honored him with great gifts, part of which Mandrocles used to have a picture painted in the temple of Hera. The picture showed the bridge, with Darius sitting on a seat of honor and watching his army cross over into Thrace. Under the picture was the following inscription:

The fish-fraught Bosphorus bridged, to Hera's fane

Did Mandrocles this proud memorial bring;
When for himself a crown he'd skill to gain,

For Samos praise, contenting the Great King.

The Samians were great sailors, and ventured as far west as Tartessus. With part of the proceeds of such a voyage they caused to be made a bronze vessel, with griffins embossed on it, and resting on three ten-foot kneeling figures wrought of bronze; this they dedicated in the temple. Ionians and Epi-aurians colonized Samos in very early times, and it became a flourishing commercial and shipping center. Polycrates made himself master of the island c540 B.C., built up a great fleet, captured many of the neighboring islands, and overcame the Lesbians in a sea fight. He compelled his Lesbian prisoners, weighted down with chains, to dig a moat around his castle. In making himself master of Samos he caused many prominent men to go into exile. They sought help from Sparta to secure their return and overthrow Polycrates. The Spartans, to punish the Samians for the theft of the bronze vessel intended for Croesus and the theft of the linen corselet intended for Amasis, agreed to help the exiled Samians. The Corinthians, because of an old grievance, joined the Spartans. They assembled a fleet and besieged Samos. When the place had not fallen after a siege of 40 days the Spartans and their allies withdrew and sailed back to the Peloponnesus. Polycrates, who had slain one of his brothers and banished another, Syloson, in winning control of Samos, had an alliance of friendship with Amasis, king of Egypt. According to legend, this friendship was broken off by Amasis because he feared lest the unfailing good fortune of Polycrates bring down on him the wrath of the gods,

who are ever jealous of and seek to humble the pride of men. Legend aside, the friendship between Samos and Egypt ended during the reign of the successor of Amasis, when Polycrates offered his aid to Cambyses, the enemy of Egypt.

The Samians were great and daring sailors, versatile traders, and under Polycrates maintained a luxurious court of which the poet Anacreon was an ornament. During his rule some remarkable feats of engineering were executed. An underground aqueduct over 1000 feet long beneath a hill 900 feet high was constructed to bring water into the city. He completed the magnificent temple of Hera, the largest of its time. Another engineering triumph carried out by the Samians was the construction of a great mole to protect their harbor. The fears of Amasis that the gods would bring evil to his too fortunate friend Polycrates were fulfilled. Oroetes, the Persian satrap at Magnesia, lured him there with the promise of great treasure for his fleet, seized him upon his arrival, and caused him to be slain. Maeandrius, successor of Polycrates, raised an altar to Zeus the Protector of Freedom and prepared to grant Samos a democratic government, but when he saw that if he gave up the tyranny someone else would seize it, he kept his despotic power. Samos was the first city, Greek or barbarian, to fall under the sway of Darius I. Some say Darius attacked Samos as a favor to Syloson, banished brother of Polycrates. This Syloson had performed a friendly act for Darius while the latter was still unknown and powerless. When Darius became king of the Persians Syloson reminded him of the incident and asked the return of Samos as a reward. Henceforth Samos was subject to the Persians. During the Ionian Revolt the Samians rose, and engaged their fleet with other Ionian units in defense of Miletus, but in consequence of an agreement made by the Samian captains with the Persians, when the battle was joined all but 11 of the Samian ships deserted their Ionian allies and sailed away (494 B.C.). This treachery was humiliating to many Samians. Furthermore, they did not enjoy living under Persian dominion. They honored the captains who had remained to fight with their allies, and then many of them left Samos and went to settle in Zancle in Sicily. Samos remained under Persian control, and fought, at the battle of Salamis (480 B.C.), under Persian command. The following spring the Persian fleet mustered at Samos, but by this time the Samians had had enough of Persian rule. They sent envoys to the Spartan admiral Leotychides, urging him to free the Ionian cities, promising that the Ionians would rise up, and assuring him of the friendship and help of Samos. Leotychides agreed; some say he was convinced by the good omen that appeared in the name of the Samian envoy: he was Hegesistratus, "Leader of Armies." The Greek fleet sailed and when it appeared off Samos the Persians, rather than risk battle, withdrew to join their land army at Mycale opposite Samos. As the Greeks pursued them and prepared to engage them on land, the Persians disarmed the Samians who were in their army. They suspected them of complicity, because they could not help but note that the Samians had ransomed many Athenian prisoners taken by the Persians and returned them to Greece. Even though disarmed, the Samians did all in their power to help the Greeks at Mycale, and the Persians suffered a disastrous defeat (479 B.C.). After the Persian War Samos was one of the leading maritime members of the Confederacy of Delos, from which it revolted, 440 B.C. Pericles besieged it, 439 B.C., put down the revolt and established a democratic government there. In the last years of the Peloponnesian Wars it was one of the most faithful friends of Athenian democracy, but afterward it was besieged by the Spartan Lysander, who restored the oligarchy (404 B.C.), and fell under Spartan influence. It was retaken by Athens, 366 B.C., and colonized by Athenians. After the death of Alexander the Great it fell to the sway of his general, Ptolemy, later bowed to Philip V of Macedon, was given by the Romans (189 B.C.) to the kings of Pergamum, and became part of the Roman province of Asia, 133 B.C. Mark Antony captured and sacked it, 39 B.C., and Augustus restored its freedom. Among the famous sons of Samos were the philosopher Pythagoras, the astronomer Conon, and the sculptor and architect Rhoecus, who is said to have invented casting in bronze and who was the architect of the Samos. [Also: Same.] Ancient city in Cephallenia.

Samosata (sa-mos'a-ta). In ancient geography, a fortified town in Commagene, Syria, situated on the right bank of the Euphrates; residence of the kings of Commagene and important commercial center. It was the birthplace of Lucian.

Samothrace (sam'ō-thrās). [Also: Khora, Samothrake, Samothraki.] Wild, rocky island in the N part of the Aegean Sea, belonging to Greece, opposite the mouth of the Hebrus River and NW of the island of Imbrus. According to legend, it was the isle of Electra, daughter of Atlas, who bore Dardanus to Zeus in Arcadia. Dardanus, some say, went to Samothrace after the great Deucalian flood and established the mysteries there and the cult of the Great Goddesses, whose images he brought with him to the island. Afterward, Dardanus left Samothrace on a raft borne up by inflated skins and sailed to the coast of Asia Minor, where he founded Troy. According to Homer, Poseidon ascended the highest mountain of Samothrace to observe the progress of the Greeks during the Trojan War. Some say Cadmus stopped in Samothrace when he was searching for his lost sister Europa. The island was famed in ancient times as the center of highly revered mysteries, those of the Cabiri, concerning which little is known. The rocky and difficult coast of the island, and the lack of anchorages, protected it from invasion, rendered it politically unimportant, and conserved the ancient mysteries intact. These mysteries assumed great importance under the Hellenistic rulers, and came to rival those of Eleusis in importance. It was when he went to Samothrace to be initiated into the mysteries that Philip II met Olympias, who became his wife and the mother of Alexander the Great. Arsinoë Philadelphus, the daughter of Ptolemy I who married her brother Ptolemy II, was banished to Samothrace and became patroness of the sanctuary. She subsequently escaped and married Ptolemy II, but continued her benefactions to Samothrace. She and Ptolemy dedicated the most important buildings on the island. Perseus, last king of Macedonia, fled to Samothrace after his defeat by Aemilius Paulus (168 B.C.)

and sought refuge in the sanctuary; he was captured there and taken prisoner. At Samothrace a French expedition found (1863) the famous statue called the Victory of Samothrace, now in the Louvre. Among the remains discovered on the island are the ruins of a temple dating from the 6th century B.C., ruins of a later temple, probably that dedicated by Ptolemy II, and a few rows of seats of an ancient theater. A New York University expedition directed by Karl Lehmann has, in a number of excavation campaigns since 1939, exposed the central area of the sanctuary. The area of the island is about 71 square miles; its highest point, 5248 feet.

Sanchuniathon (san-kū-nī'a-thon). [Also: Sanchoniathon.] Legendary chronicler of ancient Phoenicia, said to have lived before the Trojan War, whose works (allegedly founded upon records preserved in the temples) Philo Byblius pretended to have translated.

Sancus (sang'kus). In Roman mythology, a primitive god sometimes identified with Dius Fidius, and also called Semo Sancus. He was probably a god of the lightning, and was worshiped as a god of oaths, of the public laws of hospitality and of nations, and he was also worshiped as the protector and preserver of safety on the roads. Oaths taken in his name must be made under the open sky; for this reason his temples, one on the Quirinal and another on the island in the Tiber, had holes in the roof. Sancus was sometimes identified with Hercules.

Sandrocottus (san-drō-kot'us) or Sandrokottos (-os). [Also: Chandragupta.] The founder of the Maurya or Magadha kingdom in India (capital, Patna). He died c286 B.C. He reigned c322–c298 B.C. According to the Greek tradition he was an Indian king who in the time of Seleucus I (Seleucus Nicator) ruled over the Gangaridae and Prasii on the banks of the Ganges. He was of humble origin, and was the leader of a band of robbers before obtaining the supreme power. In the troubles following the death of Alexander, he extended his sway over the greater part of N India, conquering the Macedonians left by Alexander in the Punjab. Seleucus invaded his dominions, but did not succeed, and, concluding a peace, ceded to Sandrocottus his conquests in the Punjab and the country of the Paropamisus, receiving in return 500 war elephants. For many years afterward Seleucus had as his ambassador at the court of Sandrocottus, Megasthenes, to whose work entitled Indica later Greek writers were chiefly indebted for their accounts of India. The king is supposed to have abdicated and later to have committed suicide. The identification of Chandragupta with Sandrocottus admits of no reasonable doubt. This identification is of the utmost importance to Indian chronology, in which everything depends upon the date of Chandragupta as ascertained from that of Sandrocottus as given by the classical writers. Hindu and Buddhist writers are entirely silent as to Alexander, but show that Chandragupta overthrew the dynasty of the Nandas and "established freedom in India by the help of robbers." His capital was Pataliputra (in Greek, Palibothra), the modern Patna. The dynasty of the Nandas is often spoken of as the "nine Nandas," meaning "nine descents," or according to some, "the last king Mahapadma and eight sons." Mahapadma Nanda was the son of a Sudra (the lowest of the four castes of India), and so by law a Sudra himself. He was a tyrant. The Brahman Chanakya is represented as having brought about his fall. Chandragupta was then raised to the throne and founded the Mauryan dynasty, of which the great Asoka was the third king. The commentator on the Vishnupurana says that he was a son of Nanda by a low-caste woman named Mura (whence he and his descendants were called Mauryas). The Buddhists claim that the Mauryas were of the same family with Buddha, the Sakyas.

Sangarius (sang-gār'i-us) or Sagaris (sag'a-ris). A river of Bithynia. The river-god, a son of Oceanus and Tethys, imprisoned his daughter Nana and left her to die, because he discovered that she was about to bear a child. Nana had eaten an almond from a tree that had grown up from the blood of a mutilated son of Cybele, and this almond had impregnated her. She was cared for by her mother and bore a son, Atys, who was exposed to die but was rescued and brought up by shepherds. According to some accounts, Sangarius was the father of King Priam's wife, Hecuba.

Santa Maria del Sole (sāntā mā-rē'ā del sō'lā).

Circular temple at Rome, on the left bank of the Tiber opposite the Tiber island. The cella is circular, 33 feet in diameter, with a peristyle of 20 graceful Corinthian columns 32 feet high. The entablature and the ancient roof are gone. The probable date of the temple (later a church) is the 2nd or 3rd century A.D.

Santa Maria di Leuca (dē le'ō-ka), Cape. [Also: Cape Leuca; Latin, Salentinum Promontorium.] Cape at the SE extremity of Italy.

Santa Maria in Cosmedin (ēn kōz-mā-dēn'). Very early church at Rome, with ancient columns, raised choir, crypt, medieval ambos and tabernacle, fine mosaic pavement, and medieval campanile. The church is important as having replaced the ancient Temple of Ceres, Liber, and Libera, a large peripteral structure, with Composite columns, which served as the treasury and record-office of the aediles. Ten peristyle columns and parts of the cella wall remain in situ. In the vestibule is preserved a large ancient mask with pierced mouth and eyes popularly called the Bocca della Verità. It was originally set in a pavement to permit water to drain into a sewer, or perhaps an outlet for steam in a bath; but the lively imagination of the Romans, not content with so prosaic an explanation, holds that it was used in administering oaths, the person swearing being required to hold his hand in the mouth, which closed on perjurers and liars.

Santa Maria sopra Minerva (sō'prā mē-ner'vā). Church at Rome, so named, like the similarly named temple at Assisi, from being built over a temple of Minerva: the only medieval church in Rome which retains Gothic forms and decoration. The church contains beautiful tombs, notable paintings by Filippino Lippi and others, and important sculptures, among them Michelangelo's Christ with the Cross.

Santa Maura (mou'ra). See Leucas.

Santorin (san-tō-rēn'). See Thera.

Saon (sā'ōn). In Greek legend, a Boeotian who went to Apollo's shrine at Delphi to seek advice in a time of drought. He was advised by the priestess to go to Lebadia. There a swarm of bees led him to a cave which had opened up to swallow Trophonius after he had slain his brother Agamedes. At the cave, which had become an oracle of Trophonius, Saon got instructions from the oracle for ending the drought, and afterward established the worship of Trophonius.

Sappho (săf'ō). Greek lyric poet; fl. c600 B.C. She appears to have been a native of Mytilene, in Lesbos, where she probably spent her life. According to Suidas, her father's name was Scamandronymus, her mother's Cleïs. She had a brother, Larichus, who in his youth acted as cup-bearer in the prytaneum of Mytilene, an office assigned only to beautiful youths of noble birth. Another brother, Charaxus, a merchant, became enamored of the courtesan and slave Doricha, surnamed Rhodopis, at Naucratis in Egypt, and purchased her freedom at an immense price. So much is known of the brothers from Sappho's poems. She also mentions a daughter, named Cleïs. Her husband's name is said to have been Cercolas or Cercylas of Andros. She was a contemporary of Alcaeus, with whom she maintained friendly relations, and with whom she shared the supremacy of the Aeolian school of lyric poetry. She appears to have given instruction in the art of versification, and to have been the center of a literary coterie of women who were attached to her by ties of warmest affection and intimacy. According to some accounts, she was banished with others of noble family, including her fellow poet Alcaeus, by Pittacus, who overthrew the tyrant Myrsilus and took the reins of government for ten years. Some say she went to Sicily, but seems later to have returned to Mytilene. There is no foundation for the story that she threw herself from the Leucadian promontory (Leucas) into the sea, out of love for a beautiful youth, Phaon, who disdained her advances. Two odes, preserved in the works of others, and a number of fragments remain of the nine books of lyric poems she wrote. A number of additional fragments were found in the papyri discovered at Oxyrhynchus in Egypt in 1900. She wrote in a wide variety of styles and meters, in the language commonly spoken by her compatriots rather than in the literary language of the day. Her work—lyrics, elegies, epithalamia, or wedding songs—was notable in her own day and ever after for its intensely personal quality and the melodious grace of her language. Her love poetry, says Gilbert Murray, has "unrivalled splendor of expression for the longing that is too intense to have any joy in it, too serious to allow room for metaphor and imaginative ornament." Simplicity of language and immediacy of emotion are indelibly characteristic of her poems, as the following fragments eloquently testify. "Some say the fairest thing on the black earth is a troop of horsemen, others a band of foot-soldiers, others a squadron of ships. But I say the fairest thing is the beloved." "Like the sweet apple which reddens upon the topmost bough, / A-top on the topmost twig—which the pluckers forgot somehow,— / Forgot it not, nay, but got it not, for none could get it till now." (Rossetti). She was known and admired all over the Greek world soon after her death. The Greeks named her "the Tenth Muse," and called her "the Poetess" as Homer was called "the Poet."

Sarcophagus (sär-kof'a-gus). Typically, a coffin consisting of a rectangular box of stone with a heavy stone cover, often decorated. The word means "flesh-eating," and is also applied to a kind of limestone so active that it consumed the products of decomposition, which suggests that this limestone was once the material of choice for coffins of this type. The term has since come to be applied to coffins of marble, porphyry, and other stones, terra-cotta, lead, wood, and other materials; it is properly used only for coffins in which the whole corpse was buried, not for smaller chests in which the ashes of cremated bodies were deposited. The most famous with classical connotations are the Haghia Triadha sarcophagus, of terra-cotta, with scenes of ritual painted in polychrome, dating from the Cretan bronze age, and the famous collection found at Sidon in Phoenicia, which includes the splendid Alexander Sarcophagus and the Sarcophagus of the Mourning Women. In Hellenistic and Roman times sarcophagi sculptured with scenes from mythology, some executed with exquisite taste and skill, became popular among the well-to-do, and led to important developments in Early Christian art. Stone sarcophagi are readily adapted for re-use as baths, baptismal fonts, watering-troughs, dye vats, etc., and have been widely perverted to such purposes wherever found. (JJ)

Greek: Ichnousa or Ichnusa, Sardo; Latin, Sardinia.] Island in the Mediterranean Sea, situated between Corsica and Tunisia, about 150 miles W of the Italian mainland. The surface is largely mountainous, particularly in the E part of the island. It has an area of 9302 square miles. It was called Ichnusa by the Greeks who traded there in ancient times, because it is shaped like a man's footprint (ichnos). According to some accounts, it was first settled by Libyans, whose leader was Sardus and for whom the island was named. Some say Aristaeus, grieving over the death of his son Actaeon, went to Sardinia to live. Norax, said to have been a son of Hermes, sailed to Sardinia from Iberia and founded the city of Nora. Iolaus, companion of Heracles, also went to Sardinia, with a group of Athenians. He founded Olbia. He was worshiped as a hero by the Sardinians as late as the 2nd century A.D. Other legendary colonists in Sardinia were some Trojans who escaped from Troy with Aeneas. They were blown off their course on the way and landed in Sardinia, where they settled down with the Greeks who were already there. In later years, when Libyans came and attacked, they destroyed the Greeks, but the Trojans took to the hills and escaped, and kept their name of Ilians. Ultimately, Sardinia was conquered by the Carthaginians (c500 B.C.) and the Romans (238 B.C.). According to legend, there were no snakes and no wolves on the island, and only one poisonous plant. This plant was something like celery, and those who ate of it were said to die laughing, hence the expression, "sardonic laughter."

Sardis (sär'dis). [Also: Sardes.] In ancient geography, the capital of Lydia, Asia Minor, situated at the foot of Mount Tmolus, on the Pactolus near the Hermus. It was a flourishing city under Croesus. Cyrus the Great defeated the forces of Croesus before the walls of Sardis (546 B.C.), and after a short siege took the city. According to Herodotus, Croesus, who had been rescued from a blazing funeral pyre, watched the Persians plundering Sardis. He turned to Cyrus and asked, "What is it, Cyrus, which those men yonder are doing so busily?" "Plundering your city," Cyrus replied, "and carrying off your riches." "Not my city," answered Croesus, "nor my riches. They are not mine any more. It is your wealth which they are pillaging." Cyrus was so struck by this view he halted the plundering. In the revolt of the Ionian cities against Darius (499 B.C.) the Athenians and Eretrians marched with a revolting Ionian force to Sardis and burned the city (c498 B.C.). The Athenians and Eretrians then returned home, but the burning of Sardis brought the wrath of Darius on the Greeks of Europe and was an important cause of the Persian Wars against Greece. The city was rebuilt and became the residence of the Persian satraps of W Asia. It submitted to Alexander the Great without a struggle in 334 B.C. The tomb of Alyattes at Sardis is a conical tumulus 1180 feet in diameter and 142 feet high, with a sloping base-revetment of massive masonry. The Temple of Cybele, a famous sanctuary, in its existing remains of Hellenistic date, was an Ionic dipteros of eight by 17 columns, with three ranges of columns on the front, and measured 144 by 261 feet. The columns are 6½ feet in diameter and about 58½ feet high.

Sarmatia (sär-mā'shā). In ancient geography, according to Ptolemy, a territory extending from the Vistula River on the W to the Rha (Volga) River on the E, and N to the Mare Suevicum (Baltic Sea). It comprised a large part of what is now S Russia and E Poland, and was occupied by the Sauromatae and Scythians.

Sarmatians (sär-mā'shānz). See Sauromatae.

Sarnus (sär'nus). In ancient geography, a small river in Italy, which flows into the Bay of Naples near Pompeii; the modern Sarno. Near it the Goths were totally defeated (553 or 552 A.D.) by the Romans.

Saron (sä'ron). A legendary king of Troezen. According to the story, he was a great hunter. Once when he was pursuing a doe the animal fled before him into the sea. Saron followed the doe into the water and swam after it until he came to the open sea. Then his strength failed him and he drowned. The Saronic Gulf was named after him.

Saronic Gulf (sä-ron'ik). Arm of the Aegean Sea, lying SW of Attica and NE of Argolis, Greece. It contains the islands of Salamis and Aegina. Also called Gulf of Aegina.

Sarpedon (sär-pē'don). In Greek legend, a son of Zeus and Laodamia. He became ruler of the Lycians when his uncles withdrew their claim to the kingdom, and with his close friend and cousin, Glaucus, led the Lycians to the defense of Troy in the Trojan War. In the last year of the war, when the city was directly attacked by the Greeks, Sarpedon chided Hector, claiming that he was leaving the hardest fighting to the allies. He, he said, had no reason to fight, no quarrel with the Greeks, yet as a faithful ally he would do his best. When the Trojans and their allies attacked the fortifications around the Greek ships Sarpedon was in the forefront of the battle. Addressing his friend Glaucus, he said that as they had been honored the most as kings now they must fight the most to repay their loyal subjects for that honor, and prove themselves worthy of being honored. Charging into the battle, he exhorted Glaucus: together they would go on to glory; if successful it would be their own; if not, it would add to the glory of whoever stopped them. He breached the Greek wall and was the first into the Greek encampment. Although he was assailed by Telamonian Ajax and Teucer, Zeus protected him. Zeus grieved that his son was fated to die at the hands of Patroclus, who entered the struggle after the Greek ships had been set afire, and for a time considered saving him from his fate. However, Hera reminded him that the sons of other gods were fighting before Troy. If Zeus saved his son from his fate as a mortal, another god might wish to do the same. With sorrow Zeus accepted her point. As Patroclus and Sarpedon struggled, Zeus sent a shower of bloody raindrops on the Trojan plain to express his grief at his son's approaching death. Sarpedon fell, mortally wounded. Dying, he called on Glaucus to rescue his body and his arms. Glaucus, wild with grief, withdrew the spear which Patroclus had imbedded in his friend's body, and as it left Sarpedon's side his spirit fled with it. A violent struggle then broke out for possession of his body. The Greeks succeeded in gaining his armor—later it was given as a prize in the funeral games for Patroclus—but Zeus sent Apollo to rescue the corpse and bear it away from the range of weapons. Apollo wafted it away, cleansed it in a stream of pure water, and anointed it with ambrosia to erase the marks of battle. He then delivered it into the hands of Slumber and Death and it was borne back to Lycia for funeral honors.

But some say Sarpedon was the son of Zeus and Europa, and the brother of Minos and Rhadamanthys, and that he fled from Crete following a quarrel with Minos. He went to Cilicia, which was named Lycia after his successor, made himself king there, and it was because Zeus gave him the boon of living for three generations that he was among those who went to Troy.

Sarsina (sär'si-nā). In ancient geography, a town of C Italy, in Umbria. The Roman poet Plautus was born there, c251 B.C.

Satrae (sā'trē). Ancient tribal people of Thrace, of whom little is known except that they worshiped Dionysus. Herodotus mentions them as never having been subject to any city-state or empire. They are sometimes interpreted as a mythical people, eponymously identified with the satyrs, who are also traditionally of Thracian origin.

Saturn (sat'ern). [Latin, Saturnus.] In Roman mythology, a god of agriculture, believed to have been a king in the reign of Janus, who instructed the people in agriculture, gardening, and the like. The Romans identified him with the Greek Cronus who, driven out by Zeus, fled to Italy bringing with him the arts of agriculture and establishing the Golden Age. His wife was Ops, identified with the Greek Rhea, and he was the father of Picus. An ancient temple at the foot of the Capitoline was dedicated to him and Ops; in chambers in the substructure were the offices of the Roman treasury. The festival of the Saturnalia, on Dec. 17, was celebrated in his honor; it was a time of merriment and exchange of gifts, which facilitated the transition to the Christmas-New Year festival of the Christians. Saturn was also the name given to one of the seven planets for which the days of the week were named; Saturni dies survives as our Saturday.

Saturnalia (sat-ēr-nā'li-ā). In Roman religion, the festival of Saturn, celebrated Dec. 17–23. During his festival sacrifices were offered in the open before his temple, banquets were given, schools and the courts were closed, war was interrupted, and no punishment of criminals took place during the days of his festival. The period of the festival was one of joy and merrymaking, gifts were exchanged, slaves were served by their masters, games were played. It was a week of feasting and mirthful enjoyment for all, one week in which the joys of the Golden Age were recaptured.

Saturninus (sa-tēr-nī'nus), Lucius Appuleius. Roman demagogue. He was quaestor in 104 B.C. and tribune of the people in 103 and 100 B.C. Politically he was a supporter of Marius and ardently sought the favor of the popular party. With the aid of his personal bodyguard, bribery, and murder, he helped Marius to be elected consul for the sixth time, 100 B.C., and was himself made tribune of the plebs for the second time. As tribune he proposed that land north of the Po, won from the Cimbri by Marius, be distributed to Marius' veterans, and that colonies be founded in Sicily, Greece, and Macedonia. Furthermore, he demanded that the Senate should swear to approve the laws proposed by the tribunes. Only Metellus Numidicus refused to be intimidated by Saturninus and his unruly band. He refused to swear the required oath and was banished. Saturninus secured the passage of his agrarian laws following a period of great disorder. At the end of the year (100 B.C.) he was elected tribune again for the following year. At the same time his lawless ally, Glaucia, sought to become consul. The senatorial candidate for the consulship was Memmius. Partisans of Saturninus and Glaucia murdered Memmius. The tide of public feeling turned against Saturninus and Glaucia, and though Marius was greatly indebted to them he was ordered by the Senate to take up arms against Saturninus. Saturninus was defeated in the Forum, and was slain by a mob who removed tiles from the building where he had been imprisoned and pelted him to death with them.

Satyr (sā'tēr). A sylvan deity, representing the luxuriant forces of Nature, and closely connected with the worship of Bacchus. Satyrs are represented with a somewhat bestial cast of countenance, often with small horns upon the forehead, and a tail like that of a horse or a goat, and they frequently hold a thyrsus or wine-cup. Late Roman writers confused the satyrs with their own fauns, and gave them the lower half of the body of a goat. Satyrs were common attendants on Bacchus, and were distinguished for lasciviousness and riot.

Satyricon (sā-tir'i-kon). Traditional title of one of the two Latin novels we possess (the Golden Ass, by Apuleius, being the other). Ascribed by the overwhelming majority of scholars to Petronius Arbiter (d. 66 A.D.), it is believed to have been composed before 61 A.D. The work is preserved only in fragments, the largest of which, containing the Cena Trimalchionis (Dinner of Trimalchio), was discovered c1650. Formally, the work is a Menippean satire (mixture of prose and poetry); its literary genre is the picaresque novel. The narrator, one of a trio of thoroughly immoral but amusing scoundrels, recounts their disreputable adventures as wandering scholars in Campania. Love affairs (normal and abnormal) alternate with literary criticism, folk-tales about werewolves and witches, and satire on the ostentatious bad taste of the newly rich freedman class personified in Trimalchio and his guests. Other parts of the work are the story of the Widow of Ephesus (possibly of Oriental origin and of considerable influence on later European literature); a short epic, as a counterblast to Lucan's treatment of epic; and many poetic passages. Apart from its merits as a work of genuine wit, the novel is of great interest to students of Latin and Romance linguistics: here, almost for the first time after Plautus, the Latin spoken by the lower classes (which had been overshadowed by the literary language) emerges; it was from this "vulgar," i.e., popular, Latin, and not from the polished, high-class Latin of most classical authors, that the Romance languages evolved. (HS) Sauromatae (sou-rō-mā'tē) or Sarmatae (sār-mā'tē), later called Sarmatians (sā-mā'shanz). Ancient nomadic Indo-Iranian people, related to the Scythians, who inhabited what came to be known as the S Russian and N Caucasian steppes. According to Herodotus, the Sauromatae were descendants of Amazon women who had come to the shores of Lake Maeotis after their defeat at Athens by Theseus. These Amazons became the wives of young Scythians and with them migrated north beyond the Tanais River and took up their homes there. In imitation of the warlike character of their ancestresses, the Sauromatae women, says Herodotus, in his day dressed like men, hunted on horseback, either alone or with their husbands, and even took actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ġ as d or j, š as s or sh, ṭ as t or ch, ẓ as z or zh.

the field in time of war. They had no iron and instead used bone for their spear tips and arrowheads. The Sauromatae also, according to Herodotus, lassoed their quarry in hunting, and cut thin sheets from horses' hoofs and bound them together into scaly shields for use in warfare. According to the legend of the Argonauts the Sauromatae were enemies of King Aeëtes of Colchis. Jason offered to conquer them if Aeëtes would then give him the Golden Fleece. His offer was refused. Historically, the Sauromatae dominated the S Russian and N Caucasian steppes from the 4th century B.C. to the 3rd century A.D. During the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161-180 A.D.), they moved westward and invaded Dacia (Rumania). They were heavily influenced by the Greek colonies in the Black Sea region; their art is a mixture of the old Siberian "animal style" and Hellenistic elements. They became allied with Rome against the German tribes, but by the 3rd century A.D. they had become either completely dispersed or absorbed in the German migrations.

Savior. An epithet of Artemis, under which she was worshiped at many places. There was an ancient sanctuary of Artemis Savior in Megara because the goddess saved Megara during the Persian War. A force of Persians from the army of Mardonius lost their way in the hills at night. They shot their arrows into the darkness to find out if there was a hostile force nearby. The arrows struck rocks, which the goddess caused to groan. The Persians, hearing the groans, thought they were striking their enemies and shot off all their arrows. At dawn the Megarians attacked them, and since they had used up all their arrows, the Persians were unable to defend themselves and were killed. The rock, at Pagae, with arrows still stuck in it, was one of the sights shown to the traveler Pausanias centuries later. In gratitude, the Megarians raised an image of Artemis Savior at Megara, and another like it was raised at Pagae. Theseus also erected a temple of Artemis Savior, at Troezen, in gratitude for her help in overcoming the Minotaur. The people of Boeae, in Laconia, also worshiped Artemis Savior, because when they did not know where to settle, she sent a hare to guide them. They followed the hare until it went to earth under a myrtle tree. There they founded their city, Boeae, and worshiped Artemis Savior, and the myrtle tree. Zeus was also given the epithet Savior.

Scaean Gate (sē'an). The northwest gate of the city of Troy. When the Scaean Gate was opened it signified war. It was by this gate that the Trojans departed from the city when they fought the Greeks and by which they entered it when fleeing before Achilles. As had been prophesied, Achilles was slain by an arrow, some say of Apollo, before the Scaean Gate.

Scaevola (sē'vō-lā, sev'ō-), Caius Mucius. Roman hero. According to legend, when Lars Porsena was besieging Rome in 509 B.C., Scaevola, concealing a dagger about his person, went to the king's camp with the intention of putting him to death, but killed instead a royal secretary whom he mistook for Porsena. He was threatened with death by fire unless he revealed the details of a conspiracy which he said had been formed at Rome for the purpose of assassinating Porsena, whereupon he thrust his right hand into a sacrificial fire burning on an altar hard by, and permitted the flames utterly to consume the flesh and bones. This extraordinary demonstration of disregard for physical pain so excited the admiration of Porsena that he ordered Scaevola to be released. The story, which is perhaps as widely known as the one about the Spartan boy who remained impassive while a fox devoured his entrails, probably stems from an etiological legend hinging upon the name Scaevola, which means "left-handed."

Scaevola, Publius Mucius. Roman orator and jurist. He was tribune of the plebs, 141 B.C., praetor, 136 B.C., and consul in 133 B.C., at the time when the disturbances caused by the Gracchi were at their height. Although he opposed the extremism of the Gracchi he did not favor the policies of the conservative aristocratic party, and was an opponent of Scipio Africanus the Younger. He was Pontifex Maximus in 130 B.C. He is noted for the publication, in 80 books, of a digest of the official annals of Rome. Cicero speaks of his high reputation as a lawyer.

Scaevola, Quintus Mucius. Roman jurist, known as "the Augur," to distinguish him from Quintus Mucius Scaevola, the Pontifex

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hér ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

Maximus. He was born c159 B.C., and died c88 B.C., and was, in fact, an augur. He was tribune of the plebs, 128 B.C., aedile, 125, and consul, 117 B.C. He was celebrated for his knowledge of the law, civil as well as religious. In his old age he gave legal instruction to Cicero, who mentions him in several of his treatises.

Scaevola, Quintus Mucius. Roman jurist; killed 82 B.C. He was the son of Publius Mucius Scaevola. He was a tribune of the people in 106 B.C., curule aedile in 104, and consul in 95 B.C. He was subsequently proconsul of the province of Asia, and ultimately became Pontifex Maximus. He was prominent during the Social War (91-88 B.C.), which one of his laws, intended to limit Roman citizenship, did much to bring on, was proscribed by the Marian party in the civil war that followed, and was killed in sanctuary. Excerpts from his writings are preserved in the Digest. His honorable character is lauded by Cicero, who studied under him when he was Pontifex Maximus.

Scamander (ska-man'dér). In the Iliad, a plain where the Greeks assembled for the assault on Troy. It was the plain of a river of the same name which rose near Mount Ida and emptied into the Hellespont near Troy. It was believed that the waters of the river made the hair a beautiful color, and for this reason Aphrodite, Athena, and Hera bathed in it in preparation for the contest before Paris for the golden apple. The river was honored as a god by the Trojans and had its own priests. It was one of the rivers in the Troad which Poseidon, with the aid of Apollo, diverted from its course for nine days in order to wash down the wall which the Greeks had built to defend their ships. The destruction of the wall, because Poseidon feared that this man-made structure would overshadow the wall he and Apollo had built for Laomedon, took place after the Trojan War was over. The gods called the river and the river-god Xanthus, but men called it the Scamander. As a river-god, Xanthus was the son of Oceanus and Tethys, and the father of Teucer, the first king of the Trojans. See Xanthus, river-god.

Scamandrius (ska-man'dri-us). Another name for Astyanax, son of Andromache and Hector.

Scamandrius. In the Iliad, the son of Strophius.

He had been taught skill in archery by Artemis herself, but it availed him nothing when Menelaus attacked him at close range and slew him with his spear.

Scephrus (skef'rus). In Greek mythology, a son of Tegeates. When Apollo and Artemis roamed about Greece, seeking out for punishment all those who had refused aid to Leto when she was looking for a place to bear her children, they came at last to Tegea. In Tegea Scephrus met Apollo and went aside to have a private conversation with him. Limon, brother of Scephrus, observed their private parley, and feared that Scephrus was accusing him to the god. He rushed forth and murdered his brother. Artemis immediately pursued Limon and shot him. After this famine fell on the land and when the priestess at Delphi was consulted concerning this she ordered the Tegeans to mourn for Scephrus. Ever after, at the feast of Apollo Agyieus (God of the Streets) rites were performed in honor of Scephrus and, to commemorate the pursuit of Limon by Artemis, the priestess of Artemis pursued a man.

Schedius (skē'di-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Iphitus and Hippolyte. He was one of the suitors of Helen and as such had given his oath to help her husband if any evil befell him as a result of his marriage. When Paris carried off Helen, Schedius and his brother Epistropus went from Panopeus in Phocis at the head of the Phocians to assist Menelaus to recover Helen from Troy. Schedius was slain by Hector in the struggle for possession of the body of Patroclus.

Scheria (skir'i-a). In the Odyssey, the island of the Phaeacians where Odysseus landed after shipwreck and was welcomed by Nausicaä and her father, the king. The people of the island were wonderful navigators, and conducted Odysseus to Ithaca overnight. The actual place most commonly suggested as identical with Scheria is Corfu, but this identification is highly questionable.

Schoenius (skē'ni-us). A Boeotian who is named by some as the father of Atalanta.

Scione (ski-ō'nē or si-ō'nē). In ancient geography, a city on the Pallene peninsula, in Chalcidice. It revolted from Athens, 423 B.C., and gave allegiance to the Spartan general Brasidas. He was received as a hero there, covered with garlands, and crowned with a golden crown.

Scipio (sip'i-ō). [Called Scipio the Elder; full name, Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus.] Roman general; son of Publius Cornelius Scipio; born c236 B.C.; died probably 183 B.C. He served at the battle of the Ticinus (Ticino) River (218 B.C.), where he is said to have saved his father's life, and also at Cannae (216 B.C.) where he was one of the few Roman officers to survive. He became aedile in 212, and was appointed to the chief command in Spain as proconsul in 210 B.C. He landed at the mouth of the Iberus (Ebro) River and captured Carthago Nova (Cartagena), the Carthaginian port and headquarters in Spain, and with it took a rich store of war supplies. In 209 B.C. he defeated Hasdrubal, Hannibal's brother, but could not prevent him from marching to Italy to aid Hannibal. Scipio won over many of the Spanish chiefs to his side, and in 206 B.C. decisively defeated the Carthaginians at Ilipa and completed the conquest of Spain. The following year he was elected consul and was given Sicily as his province. Hannibal was at this time operating in southern Italy. Scipio was an ardent advocate of carrying the war to Africa. Over the objections of the Roman nobles he invaded Africa, 204 B.C., and the following year defeated Scyphax, the Numidian ally of Carthage, and a Carthaginian army under Hasdrubal (son of Gisco). The Carthaginians refused to accept his peace terms, although they were moderate, the war was continued, and in 202 B.C. he defeated Hannibal, who had been recalled from Italy to defend Carthage, at the battle of Zama. Carthage was compelled to submit, accepted the reasonable terms that Scipio offered for peace, and the Second Punic War was brought to a conclusion (201 B.C.). When Scipio returned to Rome he was welcomed with the greatest enthusiasm. He accepted the surname Africanus but disclaimed the other honors the grateful Romans would have given him. In 199 B.C. he was censor, but otherwise for the next few years after the end of the war he lived quietly, withdrawn from the political scene. In 194 B.C. he was consul for the second time, and in 193 he went to Africa to mediate a dispute between the Numidian king, Massinissa, and Carthage. In 190 B.C. his brother Lucius was given chief command in the war against Antiochus III of Syria. Scipio accompanied him as legate and between them they decisively defeated Antiochus. On their return to Rome, however, Lucius, who had taken the name Asiaticus, was accused of diverting to his own use some of the money paid by Antiochus to Rome, was tried, condemned, and fined. In 187 B.C. enemies of Scipio brought a charge against him of having accepted a bribe from Antiochus. On the day of the trial he completely reversed the popular mood and won their enthusiastic acclaim by reminding them that it was the anniversary of his victory of Zama. In the end the crowd marched to the Capitol with him to give thanks to the gods for such a noble citizen and to pray for more like him. After this Scipio retired to his country estate at Liternum, on the coast of Campania, where he remained until his death. Scipio was the father of Cornelia, who became the mother of the Gracchi.

Scipio. [Called Scipio the Younger; full name, Publius Cornelius Scipio Aemilianus Africanus Numantinus.] Roman general; born c185 B.C.; died 129 B.C. He was the second son of Aemilius Paulus Macedonicus (c229-160 B.C.) and Papiria, daughter of the consul Maso. His father's sister was Aemilia, wife of Scipio Africanus the Elder. When he was a young man he was adopted by Scipio Africanus, the elder son of Scipio Africanus the Elder, whence his name. He accompanied his father on the campaign against Perseus, king of Macedonia, and took part in the battle of Pydna (168 B.C.). When the battle ended in Roman victory, young Scipio was missing. His father grieved, and the men in the army, who admired the young soldier's bravery, set out to look for him. However, he soon returned to the camp with several companions, covered with blood but glowing with enthusiasm, and announced that he had been pursuing the enemy. On his return to Rome he pursued his studies, with special attention to literature. Lucilius and Terence the poets, and Panaetius the philosopher were among his friends. Polybius, the Greek general and historian who had been brought to Rome as a hostage, with 1000 other prominent Achaeans, became his intimate friend and adviser. Scipio secured (151 B.C.) the release of the Achaean hostages and they returned home. In the same year he went as military tribune to Spain where he served with distinction and won the respect of the Spanish tribes. In 149 B.C., on the outbreak of the Third Punic War, he went as military tribune to Africa, and by his personal bravery and skill saved the army of the consul Manilius from destruction. In 147 B.C., although he was under the legal age, he was appointed consul with Africa as his province. He besieged Carthage with great vigor, skill, and bravery, and despite the heroic resistance of the defenders of the citadel took it, 146 B.C. Polybius, who accompanied him, describes the war in his History. In accordance with instructions from Rome he leveled Carthage to the ground. Some say the land on which it stood was plowed and sowed with salt so that no city could ever rise on it again. When he returned to Rome he was given a splendid triumph. He acted as censor, 142 B.C., and in his term attempted to raise the moral level of the age by removing some of the more notorious men from the ranks of the senators. One who had been degraded brought charges of high treason against him (139 B.C.), but he defended himself brilliantly in speeches which were greatly admired in his time but are now lost; he was acquitted. In 134 B.C. he was again elected consul, with Spain as his province. He reorganized the Roman army that had been vainly trying to take Numantia there, and in 133 B.C. captured the city and established Roman power in Hither Spain. For his success in the capture of Numantia he was given the surname Numantinus. On his return to Rome, 132 B.C., he allied himself with the aristocratic party against the popular party, although the latter was led by his brothers-in-law the Gracchi. He appears to have been a moderate, not so much attracted by the conservatism of the aristocratic party as he was repelled by the extremism of the popular party. He was found dead in his room one morning after a tempestuous day in the forum, and was commonly supposed to have been assassinated. Scipio the Younger was one of the outstanding examples of all that was best in the Roman character in the waning days of the Republic. He was a brave and brilliant soldier, and a cultivated man of public honor and private virtue.

Scipio, Cnaeus Cornelius. Roman general; killed 212 or 211 B.C. He was the brother of Publius Cornelius Scipio. He was consul in 222 B.C., when with his colleague M. Claudius Marcellus he completed the subjugation of Cisalpine Gaul. He was appointed legate in Spain in 218 B.C., and was associated with his brother in the Spanish campaigns against the Carthaginians.

Scipio, Publius Cornelius. Roman general; killed 212 or 211 B.C. He was consul in 218 B.C., when he attempted unsuccessfully to prevent Hannibal's passage of the Rhodanus (Rhône), and was defeated at the Ticinus (Ticino) River and (with Sempronius, his co-consul, who insisted on fighting against his advice) at the Trebia (Trebbia) River. In 217 B.C. he defeated the Carthaginian fleet at the mouth of the Iberus (Ebro), whereby he gained for the Romans the supremacy of the sea. With his brother, Cnaeus Cornelius Scipio, he gained several victories over the Carthaginians in Spain, but was defeated and slain with his brother, possibly due to the desertion of native tribes who had been wooed away by Carthaginian gold. He was the father of Scipio Africanus the Elder.

Scipio, Quintus Caecilius Metellus Pius. See Metellus Pius Scipio, Quintus Caecilius.

Scira (skī'ra). See Scirophoria.

Sciras (skī'ras). Epithet of Athena. A sanctuary of Athena Sciras was set up at Phalerum by Scirus, a seer who came from Dodona to help the Eleusinians in their war against Athens, and it is from his name that the epithet comes. He fell in battle in the war, near the river which henceforth bore his name. Another sanctuary of Athena Sciras was raised at Salamis, and another was erected on the road between Athens and Eleusis.

Sciron (sī'ron). In Greek legend, a son of Pylas, and as such the uncle of Theseus; but some say he was a son of Poseidon or of Pelops. He was a robber who frequented the Molurian Rocks overlooking the sea near Megara, and forced strangers passing by to wash his feet. While they were doing so he would kick them off the rocks into the sea, where they were devoured by a turtle. When Theseus passed by on his journey from Troezen to Athens, he hurled Sciron himself into the sea, and his bones are said to form the high cliffs which still exist in the region. But some say that Sciron quarreled with Nisus over control of Megara and, in accordance with a judgment of Aeacus, was given command of the armies while Nisus retained the throne. And they say that he was an upright man, whose daughter Endeïs married Aeacus and was the mother of Peleus and Telamon. And that Theseus killed him when he captured Eleusis many years after he had become king or ruler of Athens. Later Theseus instituted the daytime Isthmian Games, formerly mysterious nocturnal rites in honor of Melicertes, in honor of Sciron.

Scirophoria (skîr-ô-fô'ri-â). [Also: Scira, Skirophoria.] Ancient Greek festival celebrated at Athens on the twelfth of the month Scirophorion (June-July) in honor of Athena (or more anciently in honor of Demeter and Persephone). The feature of the celebration was a procession from the Acropolis to the village of Sciron, where pigs were sacrificed and Athena was importuned to prevent too great summer heat. The festival is said to be named for the huge white umbrella (skiron) which was carried over the head of the priestess of Athena and the priest of Poseidon during the march.

Scirophorion (skîr-ô-fô'ri-on). The twelfth and last month of the Attic year, containing 29 days. It corresponded to the last part of June and the first part of July. A festival in honor of Athene, the Scirophoria, was celebrated in this month.

Scopas (skô'pās). Greek sculptor and architect; born in the island of Paros; fl. 4th century B.C. His first important work was the temple of Athena Alea at Tegea, built on the site of an older temple. The sculptures of it included scenes of the Calydonian Boar Hunt and the battle between Achilles and Telephus. Battered fragments of these sculptures remain. Scopas probably went to Athens c377 B.C., and remained there 25 years, when he went to Halicarnassus to superintend the sculpture of the Mausoleum. The fragments from this monument in the British Museum probably give us our most reliable information as to Scopas' style; but he is generally conceded to have led, or to have typified, a departure from the earlier serene, reposeful treatment of sculpture to the expression of strong emotion in facial expressions and in the movements of the figures. A doubtful passage of Pausanias suggests that he is represented in the sculpture recovered from the Artemisium at Ephesus. The Apollo Citharoedus of the Vatican has been associated with Scopas as a copy of his statue. The original of one Niobe group was by either Scopas or Praxiteles, probably Scopas.

SCORPIO

Scorpio (skôr'pi-ô). The eighth sign of the zodiac—the Scorpion—which the sun enters about October 24. Also, a zodiacal constellation which is prominent in early summer in the skies of the southern United States (where the whole of the magnificent tail clears the horizon). It contains the first magnitude red star Antares and several of the second magnitude. With the Chaldeans and Greeks it extended over one-sixth of the planetary circle, the scorpion being represented with exaggerated claws embracing a circular space where Libra is now placed. From this irregularity it may be inferred that the constellation is older than the zodiac, which was formed before 2000 B.C. Libra, though later, is of no small antiquity, since it appears in the Egyptian zodiacs. Its adoption by Julius Caesar in his calendar made it familiar. Ptolemy, however, though living in Egypt nearly two centuries later, follows Babylonian and Greek astronomers in covering the place of Libra with the scorpion's claws.

Scotia (skō'shi-ā). An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as a goddess of death-in-life, meaning "The Dark One."

Scribonia (skri-bō'ni-ā). Wife of Octavian, the future Augustus, whom he married in 40 B.C. and divorced in 39 B.C., some said because he couldn't stand her nagging. She was the mother of his only child, Julia, and ultimately accompanied Julia into exile.

Scylaceus (sil-ā-sē'us). In Greek legend, a Lycian companion of Glaucus and Sarpedon, allies of the Trojans. In the closing days of the war he was wounded by Ajax the Lesser but escaped death, as it was his fate to die beside the wall of his own city. He fled alone to his home city and was met at the walls by the Lycian women. They questioned him about their husbands and sons who had gone to fight at Troy, and when he told them they had all been slain, in grief and rage the women stoned Scylaceus to death as the bearer of the evil news. His tomb was built of the stones, which killed him, and stood beside Bellerophon's tomb. Afterward, at Apollo's command, Scylaceus was worshiped as a god.

Scylacium (si-lā'shum) or Scylaceum (sil-ā-sē'um). [Modern name, Squillace.] In ancient geography, a town on the coast of Bruttii, in the toe of the Italian boot, near the Gulf of Tarentum. It is mentioned in the Aeneid as "ship-wrecking," from its rocky coast. It was founded by Ionian colonists and became part of the dominions of Dionysius the Elder of Syracuse.

Scylla (sil'ā). In classical mythology, a sea-nymph. Some say she was a daughter of Phorcys and Crataeis. Others say Zeus and Lamia were her parents. Echidna, Typhon and Triton are also mentioned as the parents of Scylla. Glaucus, the sea-god, fell in love with her and wooed her with promises and prayers, but she scorned him. He asked Circe's aid to win the love of Scylla. Circe, however, notoriously susceptible, fell in love with Glaucus herself, and when she realized that his love for Scylla was unswerving she resolved to avenge herself on Scylla, whom Glaucus preferred to her. She concocted a mixture of magic herbs and sprinkled them on the pool in an arm of the sea where Scylla was wont to bathe, uttering a magic spell at the same time. When Scylla went into the pool she was transformed. The upper part of her trunk and her head, which had not been immersed in the pool, remained that of a beautiful maiden. But her waist was girdled with the necks and heads of six hideous dogs. Her lower limbs were changed into a dolphin's tail. There she stands, rooted in the sea, and whenever a ship passes near the dogs' heads reach out and grasp six seamen and devour them. Some say Scylla was transformed by Amphitrite, who was jealous because Poseidon was enamored of her, and that she had 12 arms and six terrible heads with three rows of teeth in each head. She barks like a young dog and no longer bears any resemblance to the lovely maiden she was. The lower part of her body rests in a cave in the middle of a smooth, mountainous rock in the sea which none can ascend. She eats marine animals and any seamen who are unfortunate enough to come within her reach. Odysseus lost six of his best men when he sailed too near Scylla in order to avoid Charybdis on his way home from the Trojan War. Some say Scylla seized one of Geryon's cattle from Heracles when he passed her way, and that Heracles wrathfully slew her, but Phorcys burned her corpse and she rose anew from the ashes.

Scylla. In Greek legend, a daughter of Nisus, king of Nisa (later Megara). When Nisa was attacked by Minos, king of Crete, Scylla, watching the siege from the walls of the city, saw Minos and fell in love with him. Her father had one purple (or golden) lock of hair on which his life and the safety of the city depended. For love of Minos, Scylla cut off this lock as her father slept and took it to Minos. Her father died and the city fell to his enemy, but Minos refused to take Scylla with him to Crete because he was revolted by her crime, although he willingly took advantage of it to gain the city. He sailed off without her. Scylla, hated by her own countrymen and distracted at being abandoned by her former enemy, leaped into the sea and swam after Minos' ship and clung to its stern. There her father, who had been transformed into an osprey, saw her and attacked her with his beak. Scylla loosed her hold on the ship and just as she started to drown she was transformed into a ciris, a kind of lark whose name means "shearer."

Scylla. [Modern names, Scilla or Sciglio.] Promontory in S Italy, projecting into the Strait of Messina.

Scyllaeum (si-lē'um). In ancient geography, a promontory in Argolis, Greece, projecting into the Aegean: the easternmost point of the Peloponnesus. According to tradition, it was named for Scylla, who betrayed her father Nisus for love of Minos, king of Crete. When, thanks to Scylla's betrayal, Minos had defeated the forces of Nisus, he refused to take Scylla back with him to Crete, on the grounds that she was a parricide. Scylla swam out to his ship, but he ordered his men to drive her off. Some say she drowned, and that her body was washed up on this promontory, and that it was not buried but torn to pieces by sea birds. Others say she was transformed into a sea bird.

Scyllias (sil'i-as). A Greek of Scione. According to a story told by Herodotus, when the Persian fleet took up its position at Aphetae

(480 B.C.) off Thermopylae, and secretly sent a large squadron around Euboea to cut off the Greek fleet that was stationed at Artemisium, Scyllias dived into the sea at Aphetae and did not come up until he reached the Greeks at Artemisium, a distance of ten miles. There he warned the Greeks, who were contemplating retreat, of the Persian maneuver. But Herodotus adds that it was his opinion that Scyllias actually went in a boat. At all events, the warning brought by Scyllias, plus a great storm that wrecked many of the Persian ships, decided the Greeks against retreat, and prepared them for the inconclusive sea fight at Artemisium.

Scyllis (sil'is). Greek sculptor of the archaic period, active c580 B.C., and said to have invented the art of carving in marble. See entry under Dipoenus and Scyllis.

Scyphius (sif'i-us). According to some accounts, the name of the first horse, which Poseidon claimed to have created out of the earth.

Scyrus (sī'rus) or Scyros (-ros). Island in the Aegean Sea about 25 miles E of Euboea. Theseus, returned from the Underworld to find himself no longer wanted in Athens, went to Scyrus where he had estates. There he met his death at the hands of Lycomedes, who pushed him over a cliff. Later, according to legend, Achilles was hidden at the court of Lycomedes to prevent him from going to the Trojan War. His son Neoptolemus was born on Scyrus, and left from there to go to the Trojan War after the death of Achilles. The island was conquered (469 B.C.) by the Athenians under Cimon, who also found there bones proclaimed as the bones of Theseus and restored them to Athens. Length of the island, about 19 miles.

Scythes (sith'es). According to Herodotus, Heracles, returning with the cattle he had stolen from Geryon, came to the land later known as Scythia. There, overcome with cold and weariness, he drew his lion's skin around him and went to sleep. When he woke up his mares, that he had loosed for grazing, had disappeared. He looked for them and came upon a curious serpent-tailed maiden. She admitted she had his mares but would not release them until he became her lover, and she kept him with her, although he was longing to be on his way.

When she finally permitted him to depart she told him she would bear him three sons, and asked him what she should do with them. Heracles instructed her to watch them, if she saw any one of them bend the bow as he now bent it, or girdle himself as he now demonstrated, she should make this one stay in the land with her where she was ruler. Any who failed to perform these acts as Heracles performed them she should send away out of the land. In due time the woman bore triplets, Agathyrus, Gelonus, and Scythes. When they were grown their mother tested them as Heracles had ordered. Only Scythes performed the tasks as Heracles had done. His mother sent his brothers out of the land, but Scythes she kept with her. He became the ruler of the people who took their name, Scyths, and the name of their country, Scythia, from him.

Scythia (sith'i-a). In ancient geography, a name of varying meaning. It designated at first a region in what is now S European Russia and Rumania, inhabited by the Scythians. They resisted the invasion of Darius I of Persia. Since they had neither forts nor cities, carried their tents with them wherever they went, and were accustomed to fight from horseback, their method of avoiding destruction from invaders was to refuse to stand and make a fight. When Darius invaded their country they decided, according to Herodotus, not to meet the Persians in open conflict but to retreat by a distance of one day's march before the enemy, destroying the wells and driving off their cattle as they withdrew. In this way they led the Persians all over their land, never engaging them. Darius, at his wits' end at this strange manner of warfare, sent heralds to the Scythians. They sent back presents to him: a bird, a mouse, a frog, and five arrows. Asked the meaning of these presents, the Scythian herald refused to give it. They were at last interpreted in this way: unless the Persians could turn into birds and fly away, or into mice and burrow in the ground, or into frogs and retreat to the marshes, they would never escape from Scythia but would be killed by the Scythian arrows. Ultimately Darius came to the conclusion that this was indeed the case, and retreated from Scythia, without having subdued the country. After the time of Alexander the Great Scythia was subjugated by the Sarmatians and others. Later Scythia denoted N Asia and much of C Asia, divided by the Imaus Mountains into Scythia Intra Imaum and Scythia Extra Imaum. As a Roman province it comprised the lands immediately S of the mouths of the Danube.

Scythica (sith'i-ka), Chersonesus. An ancient name of the Crimea.

Scyths (siths) or Scythians (sith'i-anz). Indo-European people, described by Herodotus, who penetrated into what is now S Russia in the 7th century B.C. According to their own account, as given in Herodotus, their nation was founded by Targitaus, a son, he claimed, of Zeus and a daughter of the river-god Borysthenes. Targitaus had three sons: Lipoxais, Arpoxais, and Colaxais. During their rule a golden plow, yoke, battle-ax, and drinking-cup fell from the heavens. When the eldest son approached to pick them up, flames burst from them and forced him back. The same thing happened when the second son approached. But when Colaxais made the attempt the flames subsided and he grasped the implements, whereupon his brothers turned over the kingdom to him. From him sprang the tribe known as the Royal Scythians, in whose charge the golden implements remained. The Greeks told a different story of the origin of the Scythians. According to their account, the Scythians were descended from Scythes (q.v.), who was a son of Heracles and a serpent-tailed maiden. Because Heracles had worn a golden goblet attached to the clasp of his girdle when he was in their land, the Scythians wore goblets attached to their girdles. According to Herodotus' account, the Scythians built no temples or altars, but worshiped gods whose Greek names were Hestia, Zeus, Apollo, Aphrodite, Heracles, and Ares. Of all peoples they were most hostile to foreign customs, and particularly hated those of the Greeks and ruthlessly prevented their adoption. In battle the Scythian soldier drank the blood of the first man he killed, and cut off the heads of all others and took them to the king, for he was rewarded by the number of heads he presented. The Scythians scalped their fallen enemies, treated the skin, and used it for various purposes. Although the principal Scythic kingdom developed between the Borysthenes (Dnieper) and Tanais (Don) rivers, Scythian invaders crossed Asia Minor and reached Syria (c650–620 B.C.). Archaeological remains of Scythic culture have been found as far west and southwest as Hungary and Bulgaria. Although the Scythian rulers were nomads, other groups within their kingdoms were agricultural. Metallurgy and pottery were highly developed among them; their "animal style," with vivid representations of men, horses, reindeer, and other subjects is famous. Also noted are Scythian burial mounds, in which concubines, slaves, horses, and a great wealth of gold and furnishings were buried with the remains of a ruler. The Scythians reached the apex of their power in the 6th century B.C.; it declined after prolonged wars with the Greek colonies on the Euxine (Black) Sea, the Celts in the areas now known as the Balkans and central Europe, and the Sauromatae in what is now S Russia. Politically, they succumbed in the 2nd century B.C.

Seduni (sē-dū'nī). Ancient Gallic tribe in the upper valley of the Rhodanus (Rhône), in what is now SW Switzerland. They opposed Julius Caesar in the Alps, but were defeated in 57 B.C.

Segesta (sē-jes'ta). In ancient geography, a city in Sicily, situated near the coast, about 27 miles W of Panormus. According to some accounts, it was founded by Acestes, son of the Trojan woman Egesta and the river-god Crimius, and was therefore Trojan, and not Greek, in origin. Segesta was often at war with Selinus, and was an ally of Athens in the Peloponnesian War, the disastrous Sicilian expedition of 415 B.C. of the Athenians being allegedly to aid Segesta. It became a dependent of Carthage c400 B.C., was sacked (307 B.C.) by Agathocles, and had its name changed to Dicaeopolis, and passed under Roman supremacy in the time of the First Punic War. There are ruins near the modern Alcamo and Calatafimi. The Greek temple, though never finished, is one of the most complete examples surviving. It is Doric, hexastyle, with 14 columns on the flanks, on a stylobate of four steps. The architectural details are of the best period. All the 36 peristyle columns are still standing, and the entablature and pediments are almost whole. There is also a Greek theater, of the 4th century B.C., with Roman modifications. In plan it is more than a semicircle; the diameter is 209 feet, that of the orchestra 54 feet; the length of the stage is 91 feet. The cavea is in great part rock-hewn.

Segusiani (sē-gū-si-ā'nī). In the time of Julius Caesar, a Gallic people living in the valley of the Rhodanus (Rhône), in the vicinity of what is now Lyons.

Seistan (sā-stān'). [Also: Sistan.] See Dran-giana.

Sejanus (sē-jā'nus), Lucius Aelius. Roman courtier; died 31 A.D. He was the son of Seius Strabo, a Roman knight, commander of the Praetorian Guard, and was a native of Vulsinii in Etruria. He became the favorite of the emperor Tiberius, who raised him to the command of the Praetorians, and, following the withdrawal of Tiberius to Capri, he became for a time the virtual ruler of Rome. With a view to usurping the imperial power, he poisoned (23 A.D.) Drusus, son of the emperor, with the assistance of Livia the wife of Drusus, whom he had seduced, and induced the emperor to banish Agrippina the widow of Germanicus. His design was ultimately discovered, and he was put to death.

Selemnus (se-lem'nus). A river in Achaea. According to legend, it was named for a local youth, a shepherd who kept his flocks on its banks. Selemnus, the youth, was loved by the sea nymph Argyra who came from the sea each night and slept by his side. But as Selemnus grew older he began to lose his beauty and Argyra ceased to visit him. Selemnus died of love for her, and Aphrodite turned him into a river. But even as a river Selemnus remained faithful to Argyra, continued to love her and mourn her. To relieve him, Aphrodite caused him to forget Argyra. For this reason, it was said that those in love could forget their passion by washing in the waters of the Selemnus.

Selene (se-lē'nē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the Titans Hyperion and Thia, and the sister of Eos and Helios. Some say Pan, in disguise, persuaded her to ride off on his back and then seduced her. She is also said to have borne a daughter to Zeus who was worshiped in Athens with her father. One night she came upon Endymion sleeping in a cave on Mount Latmus in Caria. She instantly fell in love with him and kissed his closed eyelids. By Endymion she became the mother of 50 daughters. Some say that when he later returned to the same cave he fell into a deep sleep from which he has never awakened, and that nightly Selene gently kisses him as she adores his unchanging youth and beauty. Some say Endymion himself asked Zeus to put him into an eternal sleep because he did not want to grow old. But others say it was Selene who caused him to sleep forever, so that his beauty would not fade and so that she alone could embrace him. Selene was the goddess of the moon, a beautiful winged maiden whose golden diadem casts a soft light on the earth. Her chariot was drawn by white cows, whose horns symbolized the crescent moon. She was worshiped at the time of the new and the full moon. Later Selene was identified with Artemis and with the Roman Diana.

Seleucia (sē-lō'shā). [Also: Seleuceia.] In ancient geography, a city in Cilicia, Asia Minor, situated near the coast, about 70 miles SW of Tarsus. There are remains of a Roman hippodrome.

Seleucia. [Also: Seleuceia.] In ancient geography, a city in N Pisidia, Asia Minor, near the frontier of Phrygia.

Seleucia. [Also: Seleuceia; sometimes called Seleucia Pieria.] In ancient geography, a city in Syria, situated on the coast N of the mouth of the Orontes: the port of Antioch. It was built by Seleucus I. There are many antiquities on the site.

Seleucia. [Also: Seleuceia.] In ancient geography, a city near the Tigris, about 17 miles below Baghdad. It was built largely from the ruins of Babylon by Seleucus I, 312 B.C., and was one of the largest cities of the East. It was plundered by Trajan, and was destroyed by Avidius Cassius in 164 A.D.

Seleucids (sē-lō'sidz). [Also: Seleucidae.] Royal dynasty in Syria which reigned from 312 B.C. to c64 B.C.; descended from Seleucus I (Seleucus Nicator).

Seleucus I (sē-lō'kus). [Surnamed Nicator, meaning "Conqueror."] King of Syria; born 358 B.C.; died 280 B.C. He was the father of Antiochus I. Following the sudden death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C. his chief generals, including Perdiccas, Seleucus, Antipater, Antigonus, Ptolemy, Eumenes, Craterus, and Lysimachus, being men equally of ambition and of violence, began without delay to contend among themselves for power and dominion. Perdiccas became regent for the dead conqueror's posthumous son but Antipater also claimed the regency and was supported by Ptolemy, Antigonus, and Craterus. Thus began the intermittent struggles known as the Wars of the Diadochi (Successors), which continued until 281 B.C. Seleucus was Perdiccas' chief supporter, but following the latter's defeat by Ptolemy, he engaged in the conspiracy which led to the assassination of Perdiccas in 321 B.C. In 312

B.C. he secured control of Babylonia. The city of Seleucia was built as the capital of this realm, superseding Babylon. Ambitious more than any of the others of the Diadochi to reestablish Alexander's empire in its fullness, he invaded India, but after a defeat at Pataliputra (now Patna) in 305 B.C. he made peace with the Indian monarch Chandragupta on terms including a gift by the latter of 500 elephants. In 306 or 305 B.C., following the example of Antigonus, he assumed the title of king. In 301 B.C. he joined with Lysimachus, Ptolemy, and Cassander, son of Antipater (who died in 319 B.C.), to defeat and kill Antigonus, whose ambition threatened all the other surviving Diadochi, at the battle of Ipsus. In the division of spoils following this victory, Seleucus received Syria. Thereafter he extended his rule over a large part of Asia Minor, and his power reached its height with the defeat and death of Lysimachus in 281 B.C. Following this his ambition overreached itself, as the sequel showed. Aspiring to dominate the original seat of Alexander's power, he invaded Macedonia, where in 280 B.C. he was assassinated at the instigation of Ptolemy II. Seleucus I instituted the tight, efficient system of administration, modeled on Persian absolutism, which characterized the rule of the Seleucids.

Seleucus II. [Surnamed Callinicus, meaning "Gloriously Victorious."] King of Syria; died 226 B.C. He was the eldest son of Antiochus II and the father of Antiochus III. This monarch of the Seleucid dynasty hardly deserved his surname; his story is more interesting for what was done with, for, and to him, than for any achievement of his own. His mother was Laodice, whom his father, in the course of diplomacy, put aside to marry Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy II and sister of Ptolemy III of Egypt. These formalities completed, Antiochus returned to live with Laodice, but presently she poisoned him and proclaimed their son Seleucus king (247 B.C.). Berenice summoned Ptolemy III to support the claim of her infant son to the throne, but before Egyptian aid could arrive, Seleucus procured the murder of Berenice and his rival. Ptolemy wrested parts of Syria and Asia Minor from Seleucus, who later recovered some of the lost territory. His redoubtable mother, however, backed a revolt by his younger brother Antiochus Hierax, to whom Seleucus was constrained to yield a portion of his kingdom in Asia Minor, after a battle at Ancyra (modern Ankara) in 235 B.C. His death a few years later was due to accidental causes.

Seleucus III. [Surnamed Soter, meaning "Savior."] King of Syria (226–223 B.C.); eldest son of Seleucus II. He tried to retake Asia Minor from Attalus of Pergamum but failed. He was killed in a conspiracy.

Seleucus IV. [Surnamed Philopator, meaning "Father-loving."] King of Syria (187–175 B.C.). He inherited a diminished empire from his father, Antiochus III. He was assassinated in a plot led by Heliodorus and was succeeded by his brother Antiochus IV.

Seleucus V. King of Syria (125 B.C.). He was killed in a plot directed by his mother, Cleopatra Thea.

Seleucus VI. King of Syria (96–95 B.C.).

Selinus (sē-lī'nus). In ancient geography, a city in SW Sicily, situated near the coast about 48 miles SW of Panormus (Palermo), near what is now Castelvetro. The city, named for the wild celery that abounds in the region, was the westernmost settlement of the Greeks in Sicily. It was built (c628 B.C.) by colonists from Megara and Hybla Minor and soon became rich and powerful. A quarrel between it and Segesta brought about the Athenian expedition (415 B.C.) to Sicily in the Peloponnesian War. In 410–409 B.C. the city was besieged by a huge Carthaginian force under Hannibal (grandson of Hamilcar), and after stubborn resistance was stormed and sacked. Most of the inhabitants were slaughtered, a few were sold into slavery, and a few escaped to Agragas. Selinus was the first of the Greek cities of Sicily to fall to Carthage. The following year it was rebuilt and fortified by Hermocrates, but under a treaty of 405 B.C. it became a subject city to Carthage. It never recovered its prosperity, and was utterly abandoned in the First Punic War when its few inhabitants were moved to Lilybaeum. Besides remains of the walls built by Hermocrates, the site retains the ruins of seven important Doric temples, several of them among the most archaic examples of the style known, and metopes, also in the archaic style, from an eighth temple have also been found. These temples were thrown down by earthquakes and lie in complete ruin, except that part of the peristyle of Temple "C" was restored some years ago, and since 1958 the complete peristyle and entablature of Temple "ER" have been spectacularly reërected from its fallen stones. The metopes are now in the museum at Palermo.

Sellasia (se-lā'zha). In ancient geography, a place in Laconia, Greece, a few miles NE of Sparta. Here the Lacedaemonians under Cleomenes III were totally defeated (222 B.C.) by the Macedonians and their allies under Antigonus III.

Selli (sel'i). Priests of Zeus in his sacred grove at Dodona. They slept on bare earth, did not bathe their feet, and made their bread of acorns instead of grain. Perseus sought their advice when he wanted to secure the head of Medusa.

Selymbria (se-lim'bri-a). In ancient geography, a city on the north coast of the Propontis, founded in the 7th century B.C. by colonists from Megara.

Semaleus (sē-mā'lē-us). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Sign-giving." There was an altar of Zeus Semaleus on Mount Parnes near Athens. Among the signs Zeus gave to indicate to mortals that he had heard their prayers were the thunderclap and the lightning flash. Sometimes he sent an eagle as an omen. If the eagle flew to the right the omen was propitious; if it flew to the left it was an omen of misfortune.

Semele (sem'e-lē). In Greek mythology, a beautiful daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, and the sister of Ino, Autonoe, Agave, and Polydorus. She was loved by Zeus. Hera learned that she was about to bear Zeus' child and, jealous as always of her rivals for the affections of Zeus, appeared to Semele in the guise of her old nurse. She hinted to Semele that her lover was not really divine, and suggested to Semele that she ask him to prove his divinity by appearing to her in the same majesty as he appeared to Hera. When next he visited her Semele asked that he grant her a request. Zeus swore by the Styx that he would grant her whatever she asked. However, when he learned her request he urged her to change it, but she persisted and Zeus, bound by his oath, appeared to her with his thunderbolts and the lightning. His blazing majesty burned Semele to ashes. Zeus seized her unborn child and sewed it up in his thigh until the time for its birth should arrive. This child was the god Dionysus. When Dionysus was grown he descended to Tartarus at Lerna and bribed Persephone with a gift of myrtle to release his mother. He ascended with her at Troezen, changed her name to Thyone, in order to delude the other shades who might be jealous of her good fortune, and took her to Olympus. Semele was worshiped at Athens during the Lenaea with singing, dancing, and the sacrifice of a young bull.

Semiramis (sē-mir'a-mis). In Assyrian legend, the wife of Ninus, the founder of Nineveh. She was the daughter of the Syrian goddess Derceto, and was endowed with surpassing beauty and wisdom. She beguiled Ninus into making her queen for five days, had him killed, assumed the government of Assyria, and built the city of Babylon with its hanging gardens. If we are to believe the legends, she conquered Persia, Egypt, Ethiopia, and Libya, and organized a campaign against India. Some of the exploits of Semiramis are identical with those attributed to the goddess Ishtar, and she was identified with Ishtar in a fertility aspect. The historical original of these legends was possibly Sammu-ramat, the only Assyrian queen whose name is recorded on the monuments.

Semnones (sem-nō'nēz). Ancient Germanic tribe, a principal branch of the Suevi, first mentioned by Strabo, who describes them as subject to Maroboduus. They were situated in an area from about the middle course of the Albis (Elbe) River E to the Viadua (Oder) River. They are mentioned for the last time at the end of the 2nd century A.D., in the so-called Marcomannic War.

Semo Sancus Dius Fidius (sē'mō sang'kus dī'us fid'ius). See Sancus.

Sempronius (sem prō'ni-us). [Full name, Tiberius Sempronius Longus.] Roman consul in 218 B.C.; died c210 B.C. He was a colleague of Publius Cornelius Scipio, with whom he was defeated by Hannibal on the Trebia (218 B.C.).

Senate. In ancient Rome, a body of citizens appointed or elected from among the patricians, and later from among rich plebians also, or taking seats by virtue of holding or of having held certain high offices of state. Originally the Senate had supreme authority in religious matters, much legislative and judicial power, the management of foreign affairs, and similar activities. At the close of the Republic, however, and under the Empire, the authority of the Senate was little more than nominal. The original Senate of the patricians numbered 100; after the adjunction of the Sabines and Luceres, the number became 300, and so remained with little change until the supremacy of Sulla. Julius Caesar made the number 900, and after his death, it became over 1000, but was reduced to 600 by Augustus, and varied under subsequent emperors. The struggle between the senatorial party and the popular party, beginning late in the 2nd century B.C. under the Gracchi, culminated in the fall of the Senate from real power after the assassination of Julius Caesar in 44 B.C. Apparently, administration of the large and varied Roman possessions had become too great a burden for the Senate to accomplish successfully, and graft and corruption were widespread before the Senate's powers were curtailed.

Seneca (sen'e-ka), Lucius Annaeus (or Marcus Annaeus). [Called Seneca the Elder or Seneca the Rhetorician.] Roman writer; born at Corduba (now Córdoba), Spain, c54 B.C.; died c39 A.D. He was the father of Lucius Annaeus Seneca (c4 B.C.-65 A.D.) the philosopher, and the grandfather of Lucan. He studied at Rome in the time of Augustus, was a friend of the leading orators and rhetoricians of his day, and was a great admirer of the style of Cicero. His writing consisted of imaginary legal cases (Controversiae) demonstrating the uses of rhetoric, exercises in oratory (Suasoriae), and a history of Rome from the civil wars to his own time. Of his work only five books of the Controversiae and one of the Suasoriae survive.

Seneca, Lucius Annaeus. [Called Seneca the Younger.] Roman Stoic philosopher; born at Corduba (now Córdoba), Spain, c4 B.C.; died at his villa near Rome, 65 A.D. While still a child, he was brought by his parents to Rome, where he presently studied rhetoric and philosophy and rose to prominence in early manhood as a pleader of causes. He was a senator under Caligula. In the first year (41 A.D.) of the reign of Caligula's successor Claudius, he was banished to Corsica at the instigation of the empress Messalina, who accused him of improper intimacy with Julia, the daughter of Germanicus. He was recalled in 49 through the influence of Agrippina, the new wife of Claudius, and was entrusted with the education of her son Nero. On the accession of his pupil in 54 he obtained virtual control of the government, which he exercised in concert with Sextus Afranius Burrus, prefect of the Praetorian Guard. The restraint which his counsel imposed on the emperor made his tenure of power precarious, and on the death of Burrus in 62 he petitioned for permission to retire. The permission was withheld; nevertheless, he largely withdrew from the management of affairs. He was ultimately charged with complicity in the conspiracy of Caius Calpurnius Piso, and was ordered by Nero to commit suicide. When the centurion who delivered the order refused him a tablet on which to write a will he turned to his sorrowing friends and family and said that since he could not leave them anything else he would leave them the highest gift of all—the pattern of his own life. He exhorted his friends to accept his death with the consolations of philosophy, embraced his wife tenderly, and with the utmost composure opened his veins. Seneca was highly popular as a philosophical writer in his own day. Theoretically he was a Stoic, but his interest leaned more to a practical and wise conduct of life than to abstract speculations. His pursuit of philosophy never interfered with his acquisition of great wealth. His many writings, in the style of his time, reveal his wide knowledge, and abound in aphorisms. His writings consist of the prose works De Ira, De Consolatione ad Helviam Matrem, De Consolatione ad Polybium, De Consolatione ad Marciam, De Providentia, De Animi Tranquillitate, De Constantia Sapientis, De Clementia (addressed to the emperor Nero), De Vita Beata ad Gallionem, De Otio aut Secessu Sapientis, De Beneficiis, Epistolae ad Lucilium, Apocolocyntosis, and Naturales Questiones; and the tragedies, on the Greek model, Hercules, Troades, Phoenissae or Thebais, Medea, Phaedra or Hippolytus, Senones (sen-ō'nēz or sen'ō-nēz). Ancient people of Gaul, dwelling between the Adriatic and the Apennines. They were conquered by the Romans c283 B.C. and expelled from their lands. Another group of Senones was known to Caesar in C Gaul, whose territory bordered on that of the Belgae. They opposed Caesar in the revolt (52 B.C.) of Vercingetorix.

Sentinum (sen-ti'num). In ancient geography, a city in Italy, near the Apennines, about 37 miles SW of Ancona, near what is now Sassoferrato. It is noted for the decisive victory gained (295 B.C.) there by the Romans under Quintus Fabius Maximus Rullianus and Publius Decius Mus over the allied Samnites and Gauls.

Sepeia (sē-pi'a). In ancient geography, a place in Argolis, Greece, situated on the Gulf of Argolis, W of Nauplia. Cleomenes I, king of Sparta, believing he had received assurance from an oracle that he would take Argos, marched his forces to this place and prepared to attack (c494 B.C.). Such was the reputation of the Spartans that the Argives were terror-stricken. They could think of no plan to counter-attack or defend themselves and at length resolved that each time they heard the Spartan herald shout a command to the Spartan troops they would give the same command and execute the same maneuver. When Cleomenes observed their tactics he was at first perplexed but soon thought of a way to trick the Argives. He ordered his herald to shout the command to the Spartans to disarm and take their midday meal. The Argives thankfully gave the same command and fell to eating. Whereupon Cleomenes, who had secretly given another order, set upon the Argives and drove them headlong before him. They took refuge in a sacred grove. Cleomenes attempted to lure them out by calling out the names of the leading warriors and announcing that they had been ransomed. When they came out he seized them. The Argives within the grove learned from their scouts what was happening to those who responded to Cleomenes' call and thereafter refused to answer when they heard their names. Cleomenes did not wish to invade the sacred grove. Instead he set fire to it and burned the Argives who had sought sanctuary in it. Six thousand Argives perished. Afterward Cleomenes thought to inquire to whom the grove was sacred. When he learned it was sacred to Argus he concluded that the oracle was fulfilled, some say. He had taken Argus but would not take Argos. He withdrew his forces. From this disaster Argos never fully recovered its former power and equality with Sparta.

Sepias (sep'i-as). A cape or promontory in Thessaly. Here, according to legend, Peleus caught Thetis as she slept in a cave and, although she transformed herself to many shapes, he clung to her. The name comes from the sepia fluid of a cuttlefish into which she last changed herself. The cape was sacred to the Nereids.

Sequani (sek'wa-nī). Ancient people of E Gaul who dwelt E of the Aedui, from whom they were separated by the Arar (Saône) River, and W of the Jura Mountains. They were allied with the Arverni against the Aedui. They invited Ariovistus and the Germans across the Rhenus (Rhine), allowed the Helvetii passage through their country in 58 B.C., and joined the league revolting against Caesar in 52 B.C.

Serapis (sē-rā'pis). Ancient deity of Egyptian origin, whose worship was officially promoted under the Ptolemies and was introduced into Greece and later to Rome. Serapis was the dead Apis bull, honored under the attributes of Osiris; he was lord of the Underworld and identified with the Greek Hades. His worship was a combination of Egyptian and Greek cults, and was favored by the Ptolemies for political reasons.

Serbonis, Lacus (sēr-bō'nīs, lā'kus). [Serbonian Lake.] In ancient geography, a bog or morass between the Isthmus of Suez, the Mediterranean, and the Nile delta. According to legend the monster Typhon lies under it.

Sergestus (sēr-jes'tus). In the Aeneid, a Trojan who accompanied Aeneas on his flight from Troy. His ship was separated from the others in a great storm after the Trojans left Sicily and Aeneas, driven on the shores of Carthage, thought he had been lost, but he turned up safely at Dido's court. Later, Aeneas ordered him to prepare the ships in secret for a speedy departure after Aeneas had received a message from Jupiter, via Mercury, that he must leave Dido and proceed with his destiny, which was to found an empire in Italy. Sergestus took part in the boat race in the funeral games that were held for Anchises in Sicily, but he drove his boat on a reef and came in last. He was the supposed founder of the Sergian family in Rome.

Seriphus (se-rī'fus) or Seriphos (-fos). Island of the Cyclades, in the Aegean Sea about 26 miles N of Melos. Here, according to legend, the chest containing Danaë and the infant Perseus was cast ashore. The island was a place of banishment during the Roman Empire. Area, 25 square miles; length, nine miles.

Serpens (sēr'penz). An ancient northern constellation intimately connected with, but not treated as a part of, Ophiuchus.

Serpent Column. Bronze column at Constantinople; the base of the golden tripod set up in the sanctuary at Delphi from the spoils of the Persians at Plataea in 479 B.C. It was placed in the spina of the hippodrome by Constantine. It consists of three intertwined serpents, whose diverging heads are now broken, and is 18 feet high.

Serrai (se'rē). See Serres.

Serres (ser'ēs). [Also: Seres, Serrai.] Town in N Greece, situated in Macedonia near the N end of the lake Cercinitis. The town is of great antiquity, the site on which it lies having been occupied since pre-Hellenic times. The ancient names of the town, in the territory of the Paeonians, were Siris, or Sirrhæ. Xerxes stopped here on his march into Greece, 480 B.C., and left the sacred car and horses of the Sun here for safe-keeping. When he returned after his defeat at Salamis and demanded the return of the chariot and the mares, he learned that they had somehow fallen into the hands of the Thracians.

Sertorius (sēr-tō'ri-us), Quintus. Roman general; assassinated 72 B.C. He served under Marius in the wars against the Cimbri and the Teutones, served in Spain in 97 B.C., and was quaestor in 91 B.C. When civil war broke out (88 B.C.) in Rome, he opposed the aristocratic party that was headed by Sulla and became commander of one of the armies that besieged Rome under Marius and Cinna. He was not, however, in favor of the bloodshed that followed Marius' success in gaining control of Rome. He was praetor in 83 and went to Spain as Marian commander either in the same or the following year. When Sulla gained control of Rome, Sertorius was proscribed and fled to Mauretania, where he captured Tingis (Tangier), and waged war, generally with success, against the Sullan commanders. At the request of the Lusitanians, he returned to Spain and became their leader against the Romans. He was opposed by Quintus Caecilius Metellus Pius after 79, and also by Pompey after 77 B.C. Following the death of Sulla, he was joined by Marcus Perpenna (or Perperna) and other Romans (77 B.C.). Neither Pius nor Pompey could defeat him. However, Perpenna grew jealous of his power, and intrigued with other Roman officers against him, and assassinated him, 72 B.C.

Servian Wall (sēr'vi-an). Name popularly given to a fortification wall in Rome, of local tufa in headers and stretchers revetting an earth embankment, of which substantial sections are preserved, e.g. in the entrance plaza of the railroad station and on the Aventine. These sections indicate an original thickness of 14 to 15 feet and an original height, where required by the terrain, of 30 feet or more, eventually increased to 50 feet. In Rome, masonry of this type is notoriously difficult to date, and earlier scholars identified this wall with fortifications traditionally ascribed by Roman writers to Servius Tullius, sixth king of Rome (578-534 B.C.). Historical considerations, however, indicate that at the time of its capture by the Gauls, c390 B.C., Rome was protected by no such wall, and it is now generally assigned to the generation following 390 B.C. A date of 377 B.C. has been suggested. Any major systemization by Servius Tullius of the defenses of Rome presumably took the form of an earth agger. (JJ)

Servile Wars (sēr'vil). Three wars conducted by the Romans against insurgent slaves: 1) The first war (134-132 B.C.) was occasioned by an insurrection in Sicily. The slaves were led by the Syrian Eunus who styled himself King Antiochus, defeated several Roman armies, and maintained himself at Henna (modern Enna), but was ultimately captured and executed. 2) The second war (102-99

B.C.) was occasioned by an insurrection, also in Sicily, under Tryphon and Athenion, which was put down by the consul Manius Aquilius. 3) The third war (73-71 B.C.), also called the War of the Gladiators, was occasioned by bands of gladiators who had escaped from a gladiatorial school at Capua and occupied Vesuvius, whence, under the command of two Gauls and the Thracian Spartacus, they plundered the neighborhood. They were joined by runaway slaves, defeated four Roman armies in succession, and wandered about Italy, even threatening the capital, but were finally put down by Marcus Licinius Crassus and Cnaeus Pompeius (Pompey the Great). Spartacus fell in the fighting.

Servilia (sêr-vil'i-a). Daughter of the Roman consul Quintus Servilius Caepio; fl. 1st century B.C. By her first husband, Marcus Junius Brutus, she was the mother of that Marcus Junius Brutus who was one of the chief assassins of Caesar. Her second husband was Decimus Junius Silanus. According to some accounts, she was the mistress of Caesar and the woman most loved by him.

Servius Sulpicius Galba (sêr'vi-us sul-pish'us gal'ba). See Galba, Servius Sulpicius.

Servius Tullius (sêr'vi-us tul'i-us). According to Roman legend, the sixth king of Rome. He succeeded Tarquinius Priscus, and is said to have reigned 578-534 B.C. According to some accounts, he was the son of a slave woman who had been brought to Rome from the captured city of Corniculum. Others said his mother was a noblewoman of Corniculum who came to live in the palace of Tarquinius Priscus as a friend of Tanaquil, wife of Tarquinius. When Servius was an infant, a prodigy occurred. As he was sleeping in his cradle flames burst from his head. Attendants at the palace were alarmed and called Tanaquil. She said they must not wake the child and then, because she was expert at augury, she told Tarquinius the prodigy foretold that one day Servius would be a protector of the royal house. From that time on Servius was reared as a son of the royal family. He grew up to be greatly honored by the Roman Senate and the Roman people. The sons of Ancus Marcius, fourth king of Rome, considered that Tarquinius Priscus had unjustly won the throne, which should have fallen to one of them. They plotted against Tarquinius, and sent two shepherds to him on the pretense of asking him to settle a dispute. In the course of their argument before Tarquinius one of the shepherds smote him on the head with an ax. The shepherds fled. Tanaquil had the dying king removed to an inner chamber. She persuaded Servius to give out that the king was wounded only, and she prevailed on him to act in the king's place until he should recover. Servius did as she advised; he dealt with the Senate and pretended from time to time to consult the king, who was, in fact, dead. At last when Rome was restored to order and the sons of Ancus had fled, tricked into a belief that their plot had failed, a sound of great mourning rose from the palace and the news was announced to the Romans that Tarquinius Priscus was dead. Servius assumed the throne without being appointed king by the Comitia. He was a wise and capable king. He defeated the people of Veii in war, and when he returned to Rome in triumph he found the Romans no longer questioned his right to be king. He was noted for his reform of the constitution through the institution of the tribes, classes, centuries, and Comitia Centuriata. The people were so divided that the rich had to bear a larger share of the burden of supporting the state; in return, they were extended certain privileges. In drawing up the lists of the tribes Servius took a census of Rome. He expanded Rome by adding the Quirinal and Viminal Hills and, according to tradition, surrounded it with a wall known as the Servian Wall. He also persuaded the nations of Latium to raise a shrine of Diana in Rome, and thus they tacitly acknowledged Rome as the chief city of Latium. Servius had two daughters, both named Tullia, who were married to the sons, or as some say, the grandsons, of Tarquinius Priscus. Their names were Lucius and Aruns. The daughter who was married to Aruns was ambitious, restless, and unscrupulous. Her husband was mild and lacking in ambition. She contrived the death of her husband and of her sister and married Lucius, who shared her ambition and her temperament. She spurred him on to seize the throne from Servius, her own father. He went to the Senate and seated himself on the throne. Servius, now an old man, hurried to the Senate and challenged him. Lucius Tarquinius seized his father-in-law, carried him out and flung him into the street. In the disorder and confusion Servius was separated from his attendants. He made his way alone along the street, suffering from his injuries. As he did so a band of men sent by Tarquinius, some say at the suggestion of Tullia, overtook him and slew him. Presently Tullia came by and, so it is said, drove her chariot over her slain father's body. Tarquinius seized the throne and, as an instance of his wanton cruelty, forbade burial of his dead father-in-law. The reign of Servius marked the end of legitimate kings of Rome. Before him they had been named to the throne by the Comitia. He took the throne without being so named, but his reign was subsequently legalized. Tarquinius, his son-in-law, seized the throne by force.

Sesia (se'zyä). See Sessites.

Sesostris (sē-sos'tris). In Greek legend, a king of Egypt, said to have conquered vast areas in Asia and Africa. His legendary exploits are said to be founded on the deeds of Ramses II and others.

Sessites (ses'i-tēz). [Modern name, Sesia.] River in NW Italy, which rises in the Alps and joins the Padus (Po) about six miles E of Bodincomagus (Casale Monferrato).

Sestos (ses'tos) or Sestus (-tus). In ancient geography, a town in the Chersonesus Thracica, situated on the European shore of the Hellespont, opposite Abydos. It is noted as the residence of Hero in the legend of Hero and Leander, and as the place of debarkation of the army of Xerxes in his invasion of Europe. In Homeric legend (Iliad), men of Sestos went to the aid of Troy during the Trojan War.

Set (set). [Also: Seth; Greek, Typhon.] In Egyptian mythology, the brother, opponent, and slayer of Osiris. He was the god of darkness, night, and evil. Originally, he was a war god who insured victories for Egypt, only much later did he become the personification of evil. With the division of Egypt among the gods, Upper Egypt was assigned to Set, Lower Egypt to Horus. He was called Typhon by the Greeks. In Egyptian art he is shown with a strange animal's head, having a pointed muzzle and high, square ears.

Setia (sē'shā). [Modern name, Sezze.] In ancient geography, a town in C Italy, situated in the foothills of the Volscian Mountains, SE of Rome. It was a Volscian town, and became a Latin colony in 382 B.C. Sulla captured it in 82 B.C. Among the Roman architectural remains on the site are fortification walls and a theater.

Seven against Thebes (thēbz), Expedition of, the. Polynices and Eteocles, the sons of Oedipus, agreed to rule Thebes alternately, each to rule a year and then give way to the other. Eteocles, the elder, ruled first, but when his term was ended he refused to give up the throne and banished Polynices. Polynices went to Argos. There King Adrastus gave him his daughter Aegia (or Argia) in marriage and promised to restore him to the throne of Thebes. Adrastus sought the help of six chieftains for his expedition against Thebes. He first called on his brother-in-law Amphiaraus. Now Amphiaraus was a seer and he knew that if the expedition were undertaken it would end in disaster and that Adrastus alone would survive it. He was therefore reluctant to go and tried to discourage others. But in an earlier time Adrastus and Amphiaraus had quarreled and would have attacked each other. They were prevented from so doing by Eriphyle, the wife of Amphiaraus and the sister of Adrastus. She composed their quarrel and extracted a promise from them that in future she should have the deciding word in any dispute which arose between them. Polynices learned of this agreement and acted on a suggestion that he bribe Eriphyle to persuade Amphiaraus to join Adrastus in the expedition. He gave her the necklace of Harmonia which he had brought with him from Thebes and begged her to compel Amphiaraus to join the expedition. Eriphyle succumbed to the bribe although she had been forbidden by Amphiaraus to accept any gifts from Polynices. She reminded him of his promise to let her settle any disputes between him and Adrastus and thus forced Amphiaraus agreed to go but left instructions him to take part in the war on Thebes. for his sons to kill their mother and march on Thebes when they grew up. The other leaders of the Seven against Thebes were Capaneus and Hippomedon, both Argives, and Parthenopaeus, the Arcadian son of Atalanta, Tydeus of Calydon, and Polynices of Thebes. Some writers don't count Tydeus and Polynices as leaders but name Eteocles and Mecisteus, brother of Adrastus, in their places. The leaders set out at the head of their forces and proceeded to Nemea. There they sought water. They approached Hypsipyle, a former Lemnian queen who had been sold as a slave to Lycurgus, king of Nemea, and who was now acting as nurse to his son Opheltes. Hypsipyle temporarily abandoned her young charge to lead the Argives to a spring. While Opheltes was alone a serpent attacked him. The Argives returned and slew the serpent but the child was already dead. They buried his body and founded the Nemean games in his honor. Ever after this the judges at the games wore dark robes in mourning for Opheltes, and the victors were crowned with parsley, a symbol of mourning. Opheltes' grave was in a sacred enclosure in Nemea, in which altars were set up. Amphiarus said the death of Opheltes was a bad omen for the expedition, and renamed the child Archemorus, which means "Bringer" or "Beginner of Doom." The Seven then went on to Cithaeron. Here they paused and sent Tydeus ahead to Thebes as an envoy to demand the restoration of Polynices. The Thebans refused. Now the Argives approached the walls of Thebes. One champion was assigned to each of the seven gates of the city. Within the walls Eteocles assembled his forces. He assigned one Theban chieftain to each gate to match those of his enemies. Eteocles then consulted the seer Tiresias and was told that Thebes would be victorious if a son of Creon voluntarily sacrificed himself to Ares. In spite of his father's protests, Menoeceus, son of Creon, slew himself before the gates. The Argives attacked. Capaneus, boasting that not even Zeus could stop him, set about to scale the wall on a ladder and was struck dead by a thunderbolt of Zeus. Hippomedon was slain by Ismarus, or as some say, he was overcome by a cloud of missiles hurled by the Thebans after he had nearly drowned in the Ismenus River. Parthenopaeus was slain by Poseidon's son Periclymenus. Tydeus was wounded by Melanippus and died of his wound. Amphiarus fled in his chariot. He was pursued by Periclymenus but Zeus made this virtuous man immortal. Before Periclymenus could hurl his spear into Amphiarus' back Zeus cleft the ground with his thunderbolt and Amphiarus, his chariot and his charioteer vanished into the chasm. Polynices and Eteocles met in single combat to decide who should have the throne and killed each other. Only Adrastus of the attacking force survived the disaster. He fled on the winged horse Arion which, some say, was the offspring of Demeter and Poseidon. Following the death of Eteocles, his uncle, Creon, succeeded to the throne of Thebes. He cast out the Argive dead and gave orders that their bodies were to remain unburied and at the mercy of scavenger birds. Antigone defied his order, recovered the body of her brother Polynices, and buried it. Adrastus fled to Athens, or as some say, to Eleusis, and laid an olive branch on the altar of the god as a sign that he was seeking divine protection. He appealed to Theseus and the Athenians to compel Creon to return the dead for burial. Theseus recovered the bodies and they were given funeral honors. But some say it was the wives of the fallen heroes who came as suppliants praying for the return of their husbands' corpses, and some say that Theseus made a successful war on Thebes to recover the bodies.

Seven Against Thebes, The, or Septem (sep'-tem). A tragedy by Aeschylus, produced 467 B.C. In it the curse on the sons of Oedipus—Eteocles and Polynices—that they shall divide their inheritance by the sword, is fulfilled as the Argives, at the instigation of Polynices and under the leadership of Adrastus, attack Thebes.

The scene is the Acropolis at Thebes. Eteocles, king of Thebes, addresses the citizens. He tells them that if Thebes is victorious it will be owing to the gods, but if it is overthrown he, as king, will bear the responsibility. Therefore he intends to instruct them on their duties. Their principal duty is to come to the aid of their city and their country's gods. Since the Argives are preparing to assault the city he orders the Thebans to man the walls. A scout enters. He informs Eteocles that the Argives have chosen seven great warriors to lead the attack on the seven gates of Thebes. These warriors are even now casting lots to decide how they will be assigned to the seven gates. The scout urges Eteocles to act with speed, to send the city's best warriors to defend the gates. As for him, he will go to see what more he can learn of the Argive's plans. Eteocles appeals to the gods not to let Thebes be ruined because of a father's curse and leaves to make arrangements for the defense of the city.

Seven Against Thebes, The/

At once a chorus of Theban maidens comes rushing forward. They clasp the sacred images, pour out their fears of the enemy, and make wild appeals to all the gods in turn to protect the city and save them from slavery. Eteocles returns and berates them for their expressions of terror. To fling themselves before the altars in this fashion disheartens the soldiers, spreads a poison of cowardice among the townsfolk, and helps the enemy. The women admit they were terrified and ran to the gods they could trust for protection. Eteocles does not object to their honoring the gods, but fear is contagious, he says, and he does not want it to spread through the city. The sound of battle is heard from without. Again the women stir with alarm. Eteocles orders them to return to their homes and pray that the gods will be on the side of Thebes. He assures them that he is now going to post warriors at the gates and adds that he too will take part by defending one of the seven gates. When he leaves the terror of the Theban women revives. They pray that the gods will protect the city and keep its maidens from captivity, for they know and now describe the horrors of war.

Eteocles and the scout approach from opposite directions. The scout describes the positions of the enemy. He names and describes the character, motto and shield device, appearance, and the impious boasts of the champions the Argives are sending against each of the seven gates. As he names and describes each one Eteocles chooses the Theban champion whom he considers appropriate to oppose him. Against the boastful and rash Tydeus he sends the son of Astacus, who was sprung from the Sparti and whose modesty, discretion, and valor will counterbalance the wild boastfulness of Tydeus. As the scout proceeds to name the Argive chieftains, Eteocles announces the Theban who will best oppose him. The sixth Argive named by the scout is Amphiaraus, the wise seer who, according to the scout's information, upbraided Polynices for waging war against his own city. Against him Eteocles sends one who is wise, brave, and reveres the gods, although Eteocles is convinced that Amphiaraus will not attack the gates as, being a seer, he knows he is doomed. The scout now names the seventh Argive champion, Polynices, Eteocles' own brother. He is violently clamoring to meet Eteocles face to face and vows to kill him or drive him into exile. Eteocles, realizing that his father's curse is operating, names himself as the Theban to oppose Polynices, whose name means "much strife." The chorus burst out in fresh alarm. They urge Eteocles not to risk the impiety of killing his own brother. But he feels he cannot with honor refuse to take his part in the battle, nor can he escape the curse his father laid on him and his brother. He departs to defend the seventh gate.

The Theban maidens lament the woe brought on by a father's prayer. They sing the story of Laius, how he defied Apollo's command not to produce a son and thus brought doom on himself, his son Oedipus, and his grandsons, Eteocles and Polynices. The Theban maidens express their fear that the overthrow of the ruling house of Thebes will result in the destruction of the city. As they finish their ode a messenger enters. He tells them to be of good cheer, for the city is safe; six gates were successfully defended. At the seventh, Eteocles met Polynices and the brothers killed each other. His news is followed by the arrival of a procession bearing the bodies of Eteocles and Polynices. Antigone and Ismene, sisters of Eteocles and Polynices, accompany the procession. In a long hymn the chorus laments the evil fate of the house of Laius, a fate which its members brought on and fulfilled themselves. Antigone and Ismene sing an antiphonal dirge. The inheritance which the brothers divided by the sword is to be a

In an additional episode at the end of the drama, which is thought to be spurious, a herald enters and announces that Eteocles, brave defender of the city, is to be buried with full honors. The body of Polynices, who would have destroyed his own city, is to be cast out as prey for the dogs. Antigone declares that she will give burial to her brother Polynices alone, if necessary. The Theban maidens announce that they will accompany her in a funeral procession for Polynices. For the state, they say, changes its idea of what is just with the changing times; and they will also honor the funeral rites for Eteocles.

Seven Hills of Rome (rōm). The seven hills on which Rome was originally built, included within the circuit of the Servian Wall. They are the Palatine, the Capitoline, the Quirinal, the Aventine, the Caelian, the Esquiline, and the Viminal. The elevations are inconsiderable, the highest, the Quirinal, rising 226 feet above the sea, and the lowest, the Aventine, 151. The Capitoline and the Aventine rise above the left bank of the Tiber, the former to the N. The Palatine lies between them, a little back from the river. N of the Palatine, the furthest N of the seven, is the Quirinal, and on the E are the Viminal, the Esquiline, and the Caelian, respectively NE, E, and SE of the Palatine.

Seven Sages. Seven men of ancient Greece, famous for their practical wisdom. A list commonly given is made up of Thales of Miletus, Solon of Athens, Bias of Priene, Chilo of Sparta, Cleobulus of Rhodes, Periander of Corinth, and Pittacus of Mytilene. Of the Seven Sages the story was told that once the Coans (inhabitants of the island of Cos) hauled up a great catch in their nets. Some strangers bought their catch, sight unseen. When they investigated it they found in it a golden tripod, said to have been dropped by Helen on her return voyage from Troy. When the Coans learned of the find they wanted their catch and its precious relic returned to them. The strangers refused to return it and war broke out. When this dragged on without reaching a decision it was decided to appeal to the priestess of Apollo at Delphi. She decreed that the tripod should be given to the wisest man.

With the willing consent of the Coans the tripod was sent to Thales of Miletus. He, however, modestly disclaimed the honor, saying that Bias of Priene was the wisest man. Accordingly it was sent on to him. He also refused to accept the honor of being named the wisest man, and suggested one of the other sages, and so the tripod went to each of them, and each of them was wise enough to know that he was not the wisest man. In the end, the tripod was dedicated to Apollo, some say to Ismenian Apollo at Thebes, and others say to Apollo at Delphi.

Seven Wonders of the World. The seven most remarkable structures of ancient times. These were the Egyptian pyramids, the Mausoleum erected by Artemisia at Halicarnassus, the Temple of Artemis at Ephesus, the walls and hanging gardens at Babylon, the Colossus at Rhodes, the statue of Zeus by Phidias in the great temple at Olympia, and the Pharos or lighthouse at Alexandria. The walls of Babylon sometimes replace the last.

Sextus (seks'tus). In Roman legend, the son of Tarquinius Superbus. He was said to have raped Lucretia (wife of Tarquinius Collatinus) and thus to have caused her to take her own life. See Tarquinius Sextus.

Sibyls (sib'ilz). In ancient mythology, certain old women or young maidens reputed to possess special powers of prophecy or divination and intercession with the gods in behalf of those who resorted to them. They dwelt in caves or by springs, and under the influence of a frenzy supposedly inspired by a god, they uttered prophecies, often in equivocal language. Heraclitus, in the 6th century B.C., mentioned one prophetess named Sibyl, whose legend spread to various localities; by c350 B.C. she was mentioned as many. Different writers mention from one to ten Sibyls, enumerated as the Persian, Libyan, Delphian, Cimmerian, Erythraean, Samian, Cumaean, Hellespontine or Trojan, Phrygian, and Tiburtine. Of these the most celebrated was the Cumaean Sibyl (of Cumae in Italy) whose story is that she appeared before Tarquin the Proud and offered him nine books for sale. He refused to buy them, whereupon she burned three, and offered the remaining six at the original price. He again refused them; she destroyed three more, and offered the remaining three at the price she had asked for the nine. Tarquin, astonished, bought the books, which were found to contain directions as to the worship of the gods and the policy of the Romans. As the earliest Sibyl was thought to have dwelt on Mount Ida in the Troad this accounts for the introduction of foreign gods into Rome. These Sibylline Books, or books professing to have this origin, written in Greek hexameters, were kept with great care at Rome, and consulted only by the direction of the Senate. They were destroyed at the burning of the Temple of Jupiter in 83 B.C. Fresh collections were made, which were finally destroyed soon after 400 A.D. The 14 or 15 Sibylline Oracles referred to by the Christian fathers, and still extant, have no connection with the Sibyls of mythology. They belong to early ecclesiastical literature, and are a mixture of Jewish, Hellenistic, and later Christian material. In composition they seem to date from the 2nd century B.C. to the 3rd century A.D.

Sicanian (si-kā'ni-an). A name arbitrarily given to the neolithic phase of the pre-classical, non-Italic population of Sicily (perhaps ultimately of North African origin) which was in occupation when the exploring Phoenicians and Greeks arrived in the island. In Greek and Roman writers the Sicani or Siculi are the earliest inhabitants of Sicily; Sicania and Sikelia, or Sicilia, are used side by side. In Ovid, Sicania is a poetic alternative for Sicilia. In the chronological table based on ceramic classifications, the Sicanian (neolithic) phase is followed by First Siculan and Second Siculan (bronze-age) phases, and the Third Siculan (iron-age) phase. (JJ)

Siceli (si-sel'i) or Siculi (sik'ū-lī). A people of ancient Italy, to which they had come from N Africa. They crossed the Straits of Messina to Sicily and occupied the eastern portion of the island, which takes its name from them. These were the people whom the Greeks first found in Sicily, and their culture was displaced, in large part, by that of the Greeks.

Sicharbas (si-kär'bas). See Acerbas.

Sicilian Bull (si-sil'yan). Bronze bull made as an instrument of torture by Perillus for the use of the Sicilian tyrant Phalaris. Persons selected for torture were placed in the bull's hollow body, which was then heated, the muffled screams of the victims evidently contributing to the mirth of the onlookers. As with other such devices, legend has it that Perillus was its first victim. (JJ)

Sicily (sis'i-li). [Latin, Sicilia; Greek, Sikelia; ancient names, also: Trinacria and Sicania.] Island in the Mediterranean Sea, SW of the mainland of S Italy, from which it is separated by the Strait of Messina. The surface is largely hilly or mountainous, with the volcanic structure of Mount Etna in the E and several ranges in the N. The largest plain is around Catania. The climate is subtropical, with hot, dry summers and mild, humid winters. In ancient times the island was called Trinacria, "Three Capes," from the three promontories of its roughly triangular shape—Pelorum, Pachynum, and Lilybaeum. It is thought to be the island mentioned in the Odyssey as the place where Helius pastured his sacred cattle. The land is very fertile and produced an abundance of grain. According to Sicilian tradition the island was the favorite home of Demeter, who gave the gift of grain to its people before any others, and taught them how to make use of the gift. The Sicilians claimed that the rape of Persephone took place in the meadows about the town of Henna (Enna), which lie in the center of the island. The spot, one of extraordinary beauty and noted for its abundance of violets, was called "the navel of Sicily." Near it were sacred groves, a grotto, and the chasm through which Hades bore Persephone to the Underworld.

The location of Sicily, midway between the eastern and western ends of the Mediterranean and stepping-stone between Italy and Africa, gave it great strategic importance, and made it a battleground for successive waves of colonists and invaders. The earliest inhabitants of which anything is known were the Sicanians, for whom the island was once called Sicania. They were pushed back by the Siceli who moved over from Africa and occupied the eastern half of the island, which henceforth was called for them, Sicily. In the northwest corner were the Elymi, a people who had come perhaps from Asia Minor and occupied the area in very ancient times. At an early date the Phoenicians established settlements on the coasts of Sicily. But the most important of the early immigrants were the Greeks, whose influence endured for centuries. The earliest Greek colonizers were Chalcidians from Euboea who, c735 B.C., founded the town of Naxos, near what later became the Corinthian colony of Syracuse (c734 B.C.). The Greeks pushed the Phoenicians out of their settlements, mostly trading posts, and the latter withdrew to strong areas in the north and west, near the Elymian towns of Eryx and Segesta. Other early Greek settlements on the rugged eastern coast were the Chalcidian cities of Leontini and Catana (729 B.C.), Dorian Megara Hyblaea (726 B.C.), Zancle (715 B.C.), Gela (689 B.C.), Himera, the only Greek settlement on the northern coast (648 B.C.), Selinus (628 B.C.), Camarina (599 B.C.), and Acragas (582 B.C.). The Greek cities flourished; close ties were maintained with the homeland, and the intellectual and cultural vigor of the Greek mainland took firm root and proliferated in Sicily. Behind the Greek cities of the eastern coast were the Sicel and Sicanian settlements. West of them were the strong Phoenician towns of Panormus, Solus, and Motya. These last looked to the Punic city of Carthage to protect them from the encroachments of the Greeks. In the first half of the 6th century B.C. a large force was sent from Carthage which won some Greek territory for the Punic cities of the island. This century saw also the consolidation of certain areas of Greek Sicily, and by the beginning of the 5th century B.C. large areas were under the sway of tyrants, as those of Acragas, Syracuse, Zancle, and Himera. With Greece engaged in a desperate struggle against the might of Persia, Carthage seized the opportunity presented by a quarrel between Sicilian tyrants to interfere in Sicily and to win additional influence there. Hamilcar invaded Sicily at the head of a great armament. He was resoundingly defeated at Himera (480 B.C.), where he lost his life. For the next 70 years the Carthaginians remained on the sidelines in the struggles between the rival cities of Sicily. In that time Athens engaged in an expedition (415-413 B.C.) to the island designed to curb the growing power of the Corinthian colony of Syracuse and to establish Athenian domination of the island. The Athenian expedition was not only a failure; it was a disaster for Athens. Possibly the greatest effect of it for Sicily was to show the Sicilian cities that they had attained a status of political independence and equality with the city-states of Greece. Political independence was cherished, but not more than the Greek cultural heritage. In 409 B.C. the Carthaginians returned and won firm control of the western part of the island. The history of the next century is of wars with Carthage, in which the leading Sicilian participant was the great city of Syracuse. In the course of the wars mercenaries from Campania settled in Sicily, and later gave the Romans their pretext for interference in the island. In the First Punic War (264-241 B.C.) between Rome and Carthage, Sicily was a battle-ground. When the war ended, Carthage withdrew from the island and the western half became a Roman province (241 B.C.). The eastern half remained free as an ally of Rome. In the Second Punic War (218-201 B.C.), Syracuse revolted against Rome. The revolt was put down after a two-year siege by Marcellus (211 B.C.), and the entire island became a Roman province and the prey of a series of plundering Roman officials.

Sicinus (sik'i-nus). [Modern name, Sikinos.] An island of the Cyclades, about 19 miles S of Paros. According to legend Thoas, king of Lemnos, was pulled ashore here after he had been cast adrift in a chest by his daughter Hypsipyle to save him from the wrath of the Lemnian women. The island, which had been known as Oenoë, was named Sicinus after a son born to Thoas by the water-nymph Oenoë. Length, nine miles.

Sicinnus (sik-in'us). A household slave and tutor to the sons of Themistocles. When the Greeks, assembled at Salamis, began to dispute whether they should retire to the Isthmus for the coming battle with the Persians (480 B.C.), Themistocles sent Sicinnus with a message to the Persian fleet. The purpose of this stratagem was to compel the Greeks to fight at Salamis, which Themistocles thought was the most advantageous location for them. Sicinnus was secretly put aboard a merchant ship and sent to the Persian fleet. He pretended Themistocles was friendly to the Persians and gave as a message from him that if the Persians attacked at once they would find the Greeks arguing among themselves, terrified, and an easy conquest. The Persians acted on this advice at once. Sicinnus disappeared. After some time Themistocles freed him and made him a Thespian citizen.

Sicyon (sish'i-on, sis-). In ancient geography, a city in the N part of the Peloponnesus, Greece, situated near the Gulf of Corinth, about ten miles NW of Corinth. According to legend, the city was founded by Aegialeus, son of the river-god Inachus, and was first called Aegialeia after him. In later times, Sicyon, son of Metion and grandson of Erechtheus, according to some accounts came to Aegialeia from Attica as an ally. He became king and changed the name of the city and region to Sicyon and Sicyonia respectively. Once wolves preyed on the flocks of the Sicyonians and they sought relief through an oracle. The oracle directed them to a certain spot where they would find a dry log. They were instructed to mix the bark of the log with meat and set it out for the wolves. They did so, and when the wolves ate the meat they fled and never returned. A sanctuary of Apollo Lycius (Wolf-god) was raised and the log was dedicated in it, but none could say from what kind of tree it had come. Near the sanctuary of Apollo Lycius was a sanctuary of Asclepius. The Sicyonians claimed the healing god came to them from Epidaurus, in the shape of a serpent and riding in a chariot drawn by two mules.

After the Dorian invasion Sicyon was part of Argive territory. Early in the 7th century B.C. Orthagoras became tyrant. He exercised a benevolent despotism and Sicyon flourished. His dynasty reached a peak of power and influence under Clisthenes, who contended against Argos, put an end to the recital of the Homeric poems because they exalted the Argives, suppressed the cult of the Argive hero Adrastus who had ruled Sicyon for a time, and changed the names of the Sicyonian tribes so that they should not share the names of the Argive tribes. He gave his daughter in marriage to Megacles, son of Alcmaeon the Athenian. With the Amphictyonic League, he went to the aid of Delphi (c590 B.C.), against Crisa, because Crisa claimed control over the oracle and exacted tolls from visitors to it. He helped to crush Crisa and assured the independence of the oracle. In the time of its greatest prosperity Sicyon had rich treasuries at Delphi and Olympia and was renowned for its painters, of whom Eupompus, Pamphilus, and Pausias were the most famous. After the reign of Clisthenes, Sicyon was so weakened by internal struggles between the aristocratic and democratic factions that it was able to play only a minor role in the Persian War. Afterward, Athens sought to control it. Pericles led an expedition against it but failed to subdue it. In 368 B.C. the city fell under the domination of Epaminondas. The city was destroyed by Demetrius Poliorcetes, 303 B.C. He moved the inhabitants away from the harbor to the citadel, which he considered to be healthier and safer, and built a new city there. Sicyon joined the Achaean League, 251 B.C., was taken with the rest of the Peloponnesus, by the Romans, and was destroyed, 23 A.D., by an earthquake. An ancient theater at the foot of the Acropolis where the new city of Demetrius Poliorcetes stood, was excavated by the American School at Athens. It is a large and important monument. At the bottom of the cavea there is a row of seats of honor, in the form of benches with backs and arms. Access to the cavea from without is facilitated by two vaulted passages. There is a covered underground passage from the middle of the orchestra to the interior of the stage structure. Other excavators have found remains of a council chamber and of a Doric temple of Artemis.

Greece, and bounded by the Gulf of Corinth on the NE, Corinthia on the E, Argolis and Phlissia on the S, Arcadia on the W, and Achaea on the NW. According to some accounts, Aegialeus, son of the river-god Inachus and the nymph Melia, was the first inhabitant of the land. He founded the city of Aegialea and named the region about it Aegialus for himself. After Apollo and Artemis had killed Python at Delphi they set out for Aegialea to be purified, but turned aside at a place called Fear and went to Crete instead. Plague fell on Aegialea. Seers told the people to appease Apollo and Artemis. Seven youths and seven maidens were sent as suppliants to the river and the gods, persuaded by the suppliants, came to the citadel and lifted the plague. In gratitude, the Sicyonians raised a sanctuary to Persuasion on the citadel. In the ceremonies regularly celebrated in memory of this event the images of the deities were first taken to the sanctuary of Persuasion. Then they were carried to the temple of Apollo. This temple was raised to Apollo by Proetus when his daughters recovered from their madness. Here Meleager dedicated the spear with which he had slain the Calydonian boar. The flutes of Marsyas, flung into the Maeander River in Phrygia, were brought by the river to the banks of the Asopus River in Sicyonia. Here they were found by a shepherd, who took them to the temple and dedicated them to Apollo. During the reign of Apis, who ruled before Pelops came into the Peloponnesus, Aegialea became very powerful. He extended his control to all the territory south of the Isthmus and named it Apia after himself. In a later age Sicyon, son of Marathon according to some accounts, but others say he was a son of Metion and a grandson of Erechtheus, came from Attica as an ally during a war. He became king and changed the name of the region to Sicyonia. His descendants, whose blood, they claimed, was mixed with that of various gods, ruled after him. Adrastus, king of Argos, inherited Sicyonia and became its king for a time, but afterward he returned to Argos and the throne of Sicyonia was occupied by a series of demigods. With the rise to power of the Pelopidae the power of Sicyonia declined. Agamemnon led an army against it and took it. Henceforth Sicyonia was under the domination of Mycenae. In the Trojan War men of Sicyonia sailed against Troy under the command of Agamemnon. The Dorians entered Sicyonia c1100 B.C. but did not devastate it because its ruler at that time was, as the invaders claimed to be, a descendant of Heracles. Under the Dorians it was made part of Argive territory.

Side (sī'dē). In ancient geography, a town in Pamphylia, Asia Minor, situated on the Gulf of Pamphylia, near what is now Antalya, Turkey. The site contains a Roman theater, in part excavated from a hillside and in part built up of masonry. The cavea, greater than a semicircle, has 26 tiers of marble seats below the precinct and 23 above it. A number of vaulted passages lead from the precinct to the exterior. The diameter is 409 feet; that of the orchestra, 125 feet.

Sidero (sī-dē'rō). In Greek mythology, the second wife of Salmoneus. For her cruel treatment of her stepdaughter Tyro, the sons of Tyro avenged their mother when they grew up. They pursued Sidero to the temple of Hera, dragged her away from the altar where she had sought refuge, and killed her.

Sidon (sī'don). [Modern name, Saida.] Oldest city of ancient Phoenicia. From the 17th century B.C. to c1100 B.C. it held supremacy in Phoenicia, and established most of the Phoenician colonies. Later it was surpassed by Tyre, but long continued to hold an important position among the mercantile cities of the ancient world. In 351 B.C. it was destroyed in consequence of a revolt against the Persian king Artaxerxes III, but was rebuilt and was still a wealthy city about the beginning of the Christian era. During the Crusades it was several times destroyed. The ancient necropolis, long known and exploited, has yielded numerous monuments of the most diverse ages and civilizations, from the oldest Phoenicians still under Egyptian influence, through the various stages of Greek art. In 1887 an important discovery was made, consisting of an intact subterranean mausoleum of several chambers, containing 22 sarcophagi, several of them bearing polychrome sculptures in relief of the best Greek art, and almost uninjured. The sarcophagi were transported to the museum at Constantinople, where they form one of the most important existing collections of ancient art. The Greek sarcophagi were not executed at Sidon, but were imported from different places and at different times. Their usual form is that of a temple. Four only are completely covered with sculpture; but these four rank with the finest existing productions of Greek art, and are the only sarcophagi known which belong to the best period of sculpture. The oldest is of Lycian form, with centaurs and Lapiths, and hunting scenes. The second, dating from the beginning of the 4th century B.C., is called "the Sarcophagus of the Weeping Women," from the graceful figures in the intercolumniations of its Ionic colonnade. The third bears varied scenes from the life of an Oriental ruler. The fourth is so splendid that its discoverers may be pardoned for proclaiming it the sarcophagus of Alexander. Four of its six sculptured panels represent hunting or battle scenes in which the portrait of Alexander, almost contemporaneous, actually figures. It is no doubt the tomb of an Oriental prince who had enjoyed the companionship of the Macedonian conqueror.

Siena (syē'nä). [Ancient names: Sena Julia, Colonia Julia Senensis.] City in C Italy. It was founded by the Etruscans, and became a Roman town in the time of Augustus.

Sigeum (sī-jē'um). In ancient geography, a promontory and town in the Troad, at the mouth of the Hellespont about five miles NW of Troy. It was the legendary station of the Greek fleet during the Trojan War and, according to tradition, the tomb of Achilles was here. Sigeum was colonized by settlers from the island of Lesbos. With the encouragement of Miletus, Athens seized Sigeum, but lost it early in the 6th century B.C. when Pittacus, tyrant of Mytilene, won it back for Lesbos. Athens regained control (c535 B.C.), during the rule of Pisistratus.

Signia (sig'ni-ä). [Modern name, Segni.] In ancient geography, a town in C Italy, situated near the Volscian Mountains, about 30 miles SE of Rome. It is notable for important Italic remains, which include massive fortifications in polygonal limestone masonry, with a picturesque corbelled gate—the Porta Saracinesca—a postern gate, and several sally ports, other fortifications in ashlar tufa, and an Italic triple-cella temple of the late 3rd or early 2nd century B.C. The cella walls of the temple, of ashlar tufa, incorporated in the ancient church of San Pietro, survive to nearly their original height. The temple stands on a double terrace of rough polygonal limestone (Cyclopean) construction, once thought to indicate an earlier building period but now considered contemporary with the existing temple. Signia was said to have received a Latin colony in 495 B.C., and the polygonal fortifications were formerly assigned to this period, though some scholars, deceived by their primitive appearance, considered them earlier still. It now appears safer to refer them to the period of the Punic Wars in the 3rd century B.C., when Signia was an important defensive outpost of Rome. (JJ)

Silarus (sil'a-rus). [Modern names, Sele, Silaro.] River in S Italy which flows into the Mediterranean about 17 miles SW of Salernum. Near it, in 71 B.C., Spartacus was defeated and slain by the Romans under Crassus.

Silenus (sī-lē'nus). In Greek mythology, a forest-god, depicted as a shaggy, full-bearded old man, with horse ears, and sometimes horse legs, usually drunk, and often riding on an ass or on a wine-vessel. He was reported to be extraordinarily wise, and if caught could be made to reveal his wisdom and give answers to questions. The Phrygian king Midas is said to have plied Silenus with wine and questions and received astounding answers; but nobody learned what Silenus told Midas, except that it would be better never to be born. In the 6th century B.C. Silenus became associated with Dionysus and thereafter appeared in the Dionysian frolics and processions attended by troops of satyrs. He became credited with being the foster father and boon companion of Dionysus. The term sileni (plural) is applied to a group of woodland spirits or semi-deities, who were much confused with the satyrs, whom they resembled, except that the sileni were old and were differentiated from the goatlike satyrs by their horselike characteristics. They, too, were characterized as wise, drunk, and prophetic. They were credited with being wonderful musicians, and with having taught Dionysus the secrets of the vine and wine-making. Socrates was compared to Silenus in wisdom, irony, and appearance.

Silures (si-lō'rēz). Ancient people of Britain, formerly dwelling in the hills of what is now SE Wales, at the period of the Roman conquest. The geological term Silurian is derived from this tribal name.

Silvanus, Sylvanus (sil-vā'nus). Ancient Roman god of untilled land, i.e., land outside of recognized boundaries. He was therefore somewhat feared, and was propitiated every time new ground was broken or new land cleared of trees. Every farmhouse had three Silvani: one to protect the boundaries, one to protect the farmhouse, and one to protect the herds. He was later rather freely identified with the Greek satyrs and sileni.

Silver Age. This was the second age of man created by the gods. It followed the Golden Age and was less glorious. The time of childhood and helplessness was long. The duration of manly strength was short, owing to the tendency of men to war against each other. Man in the Silver Age was less devout, and failed to make sacrifices to the gods. It was not an entirely bad age, however; there were men of honor, and after mortal life was over men were thought to live on as spirits.

Silvia (sil'vi-ā). In Roman legend, a daughter of Tyrrheus, a herdsman of Latinus. She had taught a pet stag to obey her, and to return each night to its stall. The Trojans, who had landed in Latium with Ascanius, egged on by the goddess of mischief Aleto, and unaware of the tame nature of the stag, killed it. This deed aroused the Latins against the Trojans, and was one of the precipitating causes of the war between the Trojans under Aeneas and the Latins under the leadership of Turnus.

Silvius (sil'vi-us). In the Aeneid, when Aeneas visited his father in the Underworld to learn his destiny, Anchises pointed to the shade of Silvius, among others, as one waiting to be born. He told Aeneas that Silvius would be his last child, born in his old age, and that Lavinia would bear him in sylvan surroundings. Anchises predicted the rule of his line in Alba Longa. This name was borne by sev-

Silvius Aeneas (sil'vi-us ē-nē'ās). See Aeneas Silvius.

Simois (sim'ō-is). In Homeric legend (Iliad), the god of the river of the same name near Troy. It was at the mouth of this river that Protesilaus leaped ashore from the Greek ships and became the first Greek to be slain in the Trojan War. Toward the end of the war Xanthus, also a river-god, called on Simois to help stop Achilles when he was murderously attacking the Trojans. Simois flooded his banks and washed stones and tree trunks against Achilles in a raging torrent, but all to no avail. Hephaestus, at Hera's request, came to the aid of Achilles and set the rivers afire. After the war was over Simois was one of the rivers which Poseidon, with the aid of Apollo, diverted from its course for nine days in order to wash down the wall which the Greeks had built to defend their ships. The wall was destroyed because Poseidon feared that this man-made structure would overshadow the wall he and Apollo had built for Laomedon, if it were left standing. Simois the river-god was one of the many sons of Oceanus and Tethys.

Simois. A small stream near Buthrotum in Epirus. Helenus, who went to this region after the Trojan War, named the stream after the river of the same name in the Troad.

Simoisius (sim-ō-is'i-us). In the Iliad, a Trojan youth who was named after the Simois River because he was born on its banks. He was slain by Telamonian Ajax in the Trojan War.

Simonides of Amorgos (sī-mon'i-dēz ā-môr-gos). [Also: Semonides.] Greek iambic poet; born in Samos; fl. c660 B.C. He led a colony from Samos to the island of Amorgos, whence his surname. He was a younger contemporary of Archilochus, less personal and intense in expression. Among his works was an elegy on the history of Samos, now lost, and a satiric poem in which he ascribed the least pleasing qualities in women to the animals that were distinguished for those qualities or characteristics, as, a fat lazy woman is compared to a pig, an obstinate woman to a donkey, an ugly one to a monkey, and so on. He quoted Homer, calling him "the man of Chios," in the line "Like generations of leaves, even so are men's generation," in an elegy in which he exhorted men to enjoy life while they are still young enough to do so, for "mortal men have only a short space to be young." Fragments of his work have been preserved.

Simonides of Ceos (sē'os). Greek lyric and elegiac poet; born at Iulis, island of Ceos, 556 B.C.; died at Syracuse, c469 or 467 B.C. While still a young man he became famous for his culture and his poetic gift. He was a contemporary of Pindar and Bacchylides (his nephew), and was a friend of many of the great men of his day. The tyrant Hipparchus was his friend and patron at Athens. After the murder of Hipparchus, Simonides left Athens and went to Thessaly where he was welcomed at the court of Scopas. He returned to Athens after the battle of Marathon (490 B.C.), and wrote some of his most celebrated elegies on the heroes of Marathon and Thermopylae. His elegy on the men who had fallen at Marathon was preferred to that of Aeschylus. His epitaph for the Spartans who fell at Thermopylae (480 B.C.) is moving, simple, and justly famed:

Go, stranger, and to Lacedaemon tell

That here, obeying her behests, we fell.

Toward the end of his life (c476 B.C.) he was summoned to Sicily to mediate a dispute between the tyrants Theron and Hiero I, and spent the remainder of his life at the court of Hiero at Syracuse. His poetry, among the best of ancient Greece, was in many forms, including epigrams, lyrics, epitaphs, threnodies, and, especially, hymns for the victors in athletic contests. Grace of language, sincerity of sentiment, and the simplicity with which he employed his vast learning are notable characteristics of his work. A poem on Danaë, cast on the sea in a chest with her infant Perseus, was acclaimed by the ancients for its "unsurpassed pathos."

Sinis (sī'nis). In Greek legend, a son of Polyphemus and Sylea. He was a thug who lived on the Isthmus of Corinth. He was given the name of Pityocampetes (Pine-bender) because it was his custom to require travelers who came his way to help him bend down tall pine trees until their tops touched the ground. Sinis would then let go his hold and the tree, freed from his restraining hold, would spring upright, hurling the unlucky traveler into the air as from a catapult; when he fell to the ground he was dashed to pieces. Or as some say, Sinis bent two pines to the ground and tied his victim between them. When he released the arched trees they sprang upright, tearing the victim in two. Theseus, on his way to Athens, encountered Sinis. He overpowered him and treated Sinis as Sinis had treated others.

Sinoëis (sin-ō-ē'is). Epithet of Pan, given to him because, some say, he was nursed by the nymph Sinoë. In the temple at Megalopolis in Arcadia was an image of Pan Sinoëis.

Sinon (sī'nōn). In Greek legend, a cousin of Odysseus. He accompanied the Greeks to Troy and volunteered to remain behind and allow himself to be captured when the Greeks resorted to the stratagem of the Wooden Horse in the tenth year of the Trojan War. The Greeks built the Horse and left it on the beach before Troy. They then put out their camp-fires and sailed away behind the island of Tenedos. As the Trojans swarmed out of the city to inspect the huge image, Sinon arranged for himself to be captured. He was brought before Priam in chains and cast himself on the mercy of his former enemy. He said he had been a squire of that Palamedes whose death was brought about by Odysseus, and because he knew the secret of Palamedes' death Odysseus wanted to destroy him. The Greeks, he said, resolved to secure favorable winds so that they could return to their homeland, proposed to propitiate Athena with a blood sacrifice as they had formerly sacrificed Iphigenia at Aulis. Calchas, inspired by Odysseus, had chosen Sinon for the victim, but at that moment a breeze sprang up and the rush to sail permitted Sinon to make his escape. Priam listened courteously to his tale, and as he finished it ordered the fetters removed from his limbs and promised him asylum. The king then inquired the meaning of the Wooden Horse. Sinon, well coached by Odysseus, explained that it was an offering to propitiate Athena for the theft of the Palladium from Troy; that it had purposely been made huge so that the Trojans could not take it into their city, for if they succeeded in doing that Troy would become the master of Europe. In spite of the warnings of Cassandra and Laocoön, all worked as Odysseus had foreseen: the Trojans feverishly breached their walls and took the Wooden Horse inside the city. During the night Sinon gave the signal to the warriors concealed in the Horse to come out and signaled to the fleet to return from Tenedos. He opened the gates to the city and Troy, which for years had resisted frontal assaults, at last fell through the treacherous stratagem of the Wooden Horse.

Sinope (si-nō'pē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the river-god Asopus and Metope. According to some accounts, Apollo fell in love with her and carried her off to a peninsula in the Euxine Sea to a city which later bore her name. Some say she bore Apollo a son, Syrus, who became king of the Syrians and named his people after himself. Zeus also fell in love with Sinope, and sought to gain her affections by promising to give her whatever she asked for. She craftily demanded that he assure her of lifelong virginity. He was compelled cinnabar, which takes its name from Sinope. In 183 B.C. it was conquered and became the capital of Pontus. It was later (70 B.C.) subdued by Lucullus and became a Roman city. According to myth, Sinope was named for the daughter of the river-god Asopus.

Sintians (sin'shānz). A name for the people of Lemnos. The Sintians took care of Hephaestus when he was flung out of heaven. Siphnus (sif'nus). [Also: Siphnos.] Island of the Cyclades, in the Aegean Sea about 24 miles NE of Melos. In ancient times there were rich mines of gold and silver in the island, the yield of which, according to Herodotus, was annually divided among the citizens and made them the richest of the islanders. The Siphnians furnished a treasury at Delphi which was equal to the grandest there, and at the time asked the oracle how long their wealth and good things would last. The answer of the priestess was as follows:

When the Prytanies' seat shines white in the island of Siphnos, White-browed all the market—need then of a true seer's wisdom—

by his oath to grant her wish and Sinope thenceforth enjoyed a solitary couch. It is said that she frustrated the intentions of the river-god Halys in the same fashion.

Sinope. [Modern name, Sinop.] An ancient city and seaport located on a peninsula in the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea). It has an excellent harbor. It was colonized by Milesians in the 8th century B.C. and became an important Greek commercial and colonizing center. One of its chief exports was Danger will threat from a wooden host,

and a herald in scarlet.

The Prytanies' seat referred to the prytaneum, or town-hall. About this time the building was covered with Parian marble. In the war of the Samian exiles to overthrow Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, the exiles, seeing they were temporarily at a stand, sailed to Siphnus in their scarlet-painted wooden ships. They asked the Siphnians to lend them money out of their great store. The Siphnians refused. The Samian exiles made war on them and defeated them; thus was the oracle fulfilled. The Siphnians, Ionians of Athenian stock, were among the few Ionian islanders who refused to give earth and water to the Persians as tokens of submission. In the Persian War they contributed a 50-oared ship to the Athenian fleet at Salamis. According to legend, King Minos of Crete, in his war on Athens to avenge the death of his son Androgeus, won the support of Siphnus by bribing the Princess Arne with gold. The area of the island is 29 square miles; its length is ten miles.

Sipylus (sip'i-lus). In ancient geography, a mountain in Lydia, Asia Minor, near Smyrna. A female image, believed by the Greeks to represent Niobe, was here carved out of the mountain rock. The limestone rock out of which it was carved dripped with moisture after rain, and as the water flowed over the face of the figure, disintegrating and disfiguring the stone as it ran, the Greeks considered that they beheld in it Niobe weeping for her children. The figure was, in fact, originally that of the great goddess of Asia Minor, known usually as Cybele.

Sirbonis (sér-bō'nis), Lacus. See Serbonis, Lacus.

Sirens (sī'renz). In Greek mythology, a group of sea-nymphs who by their singing fascinated those who sailed past their island, and lured them to their deaths. According to some accounts they were the daughters of Terpsichore and the river-god Achelous. Half birds and half maidens, they had once been sweet-singing maidens, companions of Persephone. When the latter was snatched away by Hades the Sirens searched in vain for her, and at last prayed that they might be given wings so that they could search the seas. The gods gave them wings, but to preserve their sweet songs the upper half of their bodies remained those of maidens. Later, the Sirens lost their wing feathers and their power to fly after being defeated by the Muses in a singing contest. In art they are often represented as hideous, malevolent, and monstrous, with the head, arms, and breasts of young women, and the wings and lower body, or only the feet, of birds. Homer mentions two Sirens; three are often depicted; but they are usually thought of as a large group. Odysseus passed them safely by sealing the ears of his companions with wax and lashing himself to the mast. Orpheus saved the Argonauts from their enchantment by singing even more enchantingly. The Sirens were doomed to die when mortals could resist them (they leaped into the sea and became rocks). In early belief they were thought of as accompanying the souls of the dead from earth to Hades.

Siris (sī'ris). In ancient geography, a city of Magna Graecia, Italy, situated at or near the mouth of the Siris River.

Siris River. [Modern Italian name, Sinno.] In ancient geography, a small river in Italy; flowing into the Gulf of Tarentum in what is now the province of Potenza. Near it Pyrrhus defeated (280 B.C.) the Romans in the battle of Heraclea.

Sirius (sir'i-us). [Also: Dog Star.] According to legend, Orion's dog, who accompanied him wherever he went, and was placed with him in the heavens forever following at his master's heels, as the constellation Canis Major. As a star, Sirius is a brilliant one, the brightest in the heavens.

Siros (sē'rōs). See Syrus.

Sisamnes (sis-am'nēz). A Persian, active in the 6th century B.C. He was one of the Royal judges. Cambyses, discovering that he had accepted a bribe to give an unrighteous sentence, had him slain and flayed. He had the skin of Sisamnes tanned as leather, cut into strips, and stretched across the seat of the throne on which the royal judge sat when dispensing justice. Cambyzes then appointed Otanes, son of Sisamnes, as judge in his father's place, and recommended him never to forget that the throne on which he sat was webbed with his father's skin.

Sisenna (si-sen'a), Lucius Cornelius. Roman historian; born c.119 B.C.; died 67 B.C. He was the author of a work on Roman history, the Historiae, of which a number of fragments survive. It dealt particularly with events of the early 1st century B.C., the Social War and the civil war of Sulla. (JJ)

Sistan (sē-stän'). See Seistan.

Sisyphus (sis'i-fus). In Greek mythology, a son of Aeolus, and a brother of Salmoneus and Athamas. He lived on the Isthmus of Corinth and was married to Merope, one of the Pleiades, who bore him Glaucus (father of Bellerophon), Ornytion, and Sinon. According to some accounts, he was the founder of Ephyra (later Corinth), where he promoted the trade and navigation of the city and founded the Isthmian Games in honor of Melicertes. Others say Medea bequeathed him the kingdom of Corinth when she fled from there. Homer names Sisyphus as the craftiest of mortals. At one time Sisyphus noticed that his fine cattle were disappearing, and suspected his neighbor Autolycus, a noted thief. But he could not prove anything because Autolycus had the ability to change the color of the cattle or add to or subtract horns from them at will. Sisyphus put a secret mark on the hoofs of his animals, and next day traced them to Autolycus. When he went to reclaim them he took the opportunity to ravish Anticlea, daughter of Autolycus, who subsequently bore him Odysseus (as Anticlea was the wife of Laertes, Odysseus was brought up as Laertes' son). Later Sisyphus seduced Tyro, daughter of his brother Salmoneus, in the execution of an oracular pronouncement that he should have sons by his niece if he wished to regain Thessaly, which Salmoneus had seized from him. However, Tyro killed the children she bore him. In exchange for a permanent spring, with which Asopus the river-god supplied Corinth, Sisyphus informed Asopus that Zeus had abducted his daughter Aegina. Zeus punished him for talebearing by commanding Hades to take him away to the Underworld, but when Hades came for him Sisyphus tricked him so that he was powerless. As long as Hades was compelled by Sisyphus to remain on earth no one could die. After a few days of this horrible state Ares rescued Hades and Sisyphus was led off to the Underworld. Before he went, however, Sisyphus instructed his wife not to perform burial rites for him. Arrived in the Underworld, he appealed to Persephone, saying he had not been properly buried, and requesting the privilege of returning to earth to arrange for his burial, after which he promised to return. Persephone granted his request, and of course Sisyphus broke his promise as soon as he saw the light of day. Hermes was commanded to pursue him and to carry him back to the Underworld. For his various crimes and deceptions Sisyphus was given the punishment of being compelled to push a huge stone up a slope. As fast as he got it to the top the stone slipped away from him and rolled down again. Thus he is eternally pushing a stone which eternally escapes just when he is on the point of completing his labor. Odysseus saw him toiling away at this task when he visited the Underworld. As one of the great sinners, Sisyphus is confined to Tartarus.

Skyphos (ski'fos). In ancient Greece, a large drinking-cup shaped like the kylix, and, like it, with two handles not extending above the rim, but without a foot.

Skyros (skē'ros). See Scyrus.

Sleep. [Greek, Hypnos; Latin, Somnus.] In classical mythology, the brother of Death (Thanatos) and the child of Night (Nyx). Sleep dwelt in the Underworld, in a cave near the misty land of Cimmeria where the rays of the sun never reached. No birds or beasts lived in the land, and the only sound came from the murmuring of the river Lethe as it washed over the pebbles in its bed. Poppies and other drugs grew in profusion before the cave of Sleep. Inside the cave, he rested on a sable-draped couch, surrounded by empty dreams. Sleep was often called on by the gods to deliver dreams to mortals or for other reasons. In the Iliad, Sleep was bribed by Hera to lull Zeus so that he would neglect the Trojans and give the Greeks a chance to win. Sleep was not anxious to do Hera's bidding in this case, because he remembered the anger of Zeus when he had lulled him to sleep before so that Hera could shipwreck Heracles on the isle of Cos. Sleep escaped that time only with the help of Night and by changing himself into a bird. Hera overcame his reluctance and he once again lulled Zeus to sleep.

Smerdis (smēr'dis). [Also: Bardiya.] A son of Cyrus the Great, and the younger brother of Cambyses. Cyrus made him governor of the provinces in the east before he died. He accompanied Cambyses on his campaign against Egypt, but was sent back to Persia by his jealous brother because, according to Herodotus, Smerdis was the only one of all the Persians able to bend a bow that the Aethiopians had sent to Cambyses. Cambyses then dreamed that Smerdis sat on the royal throne and that his head touched the heavens. He interpreted this to mean that Smerdis would seize his throne. To prevent this, Cambyses ordered his trusted aide Prexaspes to return to Persia and secretly to slay Smerdis. Prexaspes successfully carried out this command (c523 B.C.), but the death of Smerdis was not generally known, and a false Smerdis arose and assumed his place and name.

Smerdis, False. [Original name, Gaumata.] A Median magus (priest). His brother Patizeithes was left in charge of the king's household when Cambyses, son of Cyrus the Great, left Susa to attack Egypt. Patizeithes conceived a bold plan to rebel against Cambyses and seize the throne. He knew that Smerdis, son of Cyrus, had been secretly slain at Cambyses' order. His brother Gaumata bore a strong resemblance to Smerdis. Patizeithes engineered a revolt, which consisted in setting Gaumata on the throne, announcing that he was Smerdis, son of Cyrus, and sending heralds throughout the land and beyond its borders to proclaim that Smerdis, not Cambyses was the true king. When this news reached Cambyses he concluded that Prexaspes, the trusted aide whom he had ordered to slay

Smerdis, had betrayed him and had not carried out his orders. He charged Prexaspes with treachery. Prexaspes assured Cambyses that he had carried out his orders and had buried Smerdis with his own hands, and that the man who had sent out the heralds proclaiming Smerdis was king could not be Smerdis, son of Cyrus, unless the dead could return to life. Prexaspes called the herald who had brought the news before him and questioned him; he learned that the herald had never seen Smerdis but had received his orders from Patizeithes, the magus left in charge by Cambyses. Prexaspes immediately divined what had happened: that Gaumata, the brother of Patizeithes, had set himself up as Smerdis and seized the throne. Cambyses determined to return to Susa and expose the impostor, but as he leaped to his horse he was wounded by his own sword. The wound did not heal. When he realized that his end was near he called the chief Persians to him and related to them that because of a false dream he had caused his brother Smerdis to be slain. He assured them that the Smerdis now occupying the throne was an impostor. He charged his chiefs not to allow the throne of Persia to remain in the hands of the Medes, but to recover it, taking whatever means were necessary. After the death of Cambyses Prexaspes swore that he had not killed Smerdis, as it was unsafe for him to admit it now that a Smerdis was on the throne. The chiefs who had heard the words of dying Cambyses thought he had invented his tale out of hatred of his brother and in the hope of causing his downfall, so Smerdis the magus was undisturbed in his reign. He ruled for seven months, and in this time freed all the nations under his sway from war service. But in the eighth month there were some who began to suspect he was not truly Smerdis, for he never left the palace and no one was allowed to see him. One of those whose suspicions were aroused was Otanes, a Persian nobleman. His daughter Phaedima had been among the wives of Cambyses, and on his death she was taken over, with the other wives, by Smerdis. Otanes sent word asking his daughter if the man who shared her couch was actually Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, or some other man. She replied that she did not know, as she had never seen Smerdis, and furthermore, she could not ask because all the wives had been separated by the new king and were forbidden to communicate with each other. Otanes was now sure that this king was an impostor. He instructed his daughter, when the king came to her bed, to feel his ears while he slept. If he had ears it was truly Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, but if he had no ears it was Gaumata the magus, because during the lifetime of Cyrus, Gaumata the magus had had his ears cut off as a punishment for a crime. Phaedima, in spite of the risk, agreed to do as her father commanded. She subsequently reported that the man who came to her as the king had no ears. Otanes knew now that this man was Gaumata, an impostor. He shared his information with five others whose suspicions had been aroused, and when Darius the son of Hystaspes came to Susa on official business, they took him also into their confidence. Darius urged instant action lest, since so many already knew the king was an impostor, others take action instead. He threatened to reveal their conspiracy to Smerdis himself if they did not act at once. The six others agreed to make an immediate attack on the king in his palace and set out. Meantime the false Smerdis had decided to make a friend of Prexaspes, since he alone knew for certain of the death of Smerdis. Prexaspes was won by his bribes and agreed to go to the top of a tower and proclaim to the people that the Persians were ruled by Smerdis, son of Cyrus, and none other. When he had mounted the tower, however, Prexaspes, a loyal Persian, recited the genealogy of the Persian kings and ended by saying that he had, at the command of Cambyses, killed Smerdis son of Cyrus; that the present ruler was an impostor, a Median magus. Then calling down curses on the Persians if they did not regain the throne from the Medes, he leaped from the tower to his death. Darius, Otanes, and the other conspirators learned of these events as they were on their way to attack Smerdis. All except Darius favored postponing the attack because of the turmoil into which Prexaspes' statements and death had thrown the capitol. As they argued with Darius two pairs of vultures, pursued by seven hawks, flew over. The hawks overtook the vultures and clawed them with their talons and goaded them with their beaks. This omen convinced them that they should immediately carry out their plan. They proceeded to the palace. As prominent Persian nobles they were admitted without question, but being accosted by eunuchs in the courtyard, they forced their way past and entered the palace. They found the two brother magi within, discussing the revelations of Prexaspes, set upon them and killed them (521 B.C.). Darius and the others decapitated them, mounted their heads on pikes, and went out of the palace, exhibiting the heads and shouting that the impostor was dead. When the Persians realized how they had been hoodwinked they turned on all the other magi and killed every one they could lay their hands on. Ever after, the anniversary of the day was celebrated by a great festival called the Slaughter of the Magi, and no magus dared to show his face abroad on that day.

Smilis (smī'lis). Aeginetan sculptor, c580–540 B.C. Some say he was a contemporary of Daedalus. Among his works were the images of the Horae (Seasons) in the temple of Hera at Olympia, and an image of Hera in her temple at Samos.

Smintheus (smin'thē-us, -thūs). An epithet of Apollo, referring to his function as mouse god. Mice were associated with disease and its cure, and white mice were kept in Apollo's temples to protect against pestilence and to prevent plagues of mice.

Smyrna (smēr'na). A daughter of Cinyras. See Myrrha.

Smyrna. [Modern name, Izmir.] In ancient geography, a city on an arm of the Aegean Sea, in Lydia, Asia Minor. It had been one of the 12 Aeolian cities, but was seized by Ionians from Colophon (shortly before 688 B.C.) and compelled to join the Ionian League. Thanks to its location it became a flourishing and rich commercial city, and hence a target for the Lydian kings who were extending their power over the Ionian cities. The Lydian king Alyattes (c617–560 B.C.) conquered and destroyed it. Almost 300 years later a vision came to Alexander the Great commanding him to rebuild the city and to bring back the people of Smyrna. The vision having been verified by the oracle at Clarus, Alexander sent his generals Lysimachus and Antigonos to rebuild and enlarge the city, and it became one of the chief cities of Asia Minor. It was destroyed by earthquakes in 178 and 180 A.D. and again restored by Marcus Aurelius. Smyrna was one of the cities that claimed to be the birthplace of Homer. It was also the first Ionian city to send to the Olympic Games a contestant who won the victor's crown (688 B.C.).

Social Wars. In Greek history: 1) A war (357 or 358–355 B.C.) in which Athens was defeated by her former allies Byzantium, Chios, Cos, and Rhodes. 2) A war between the Achaean and Aetolian leagues (219–217 B.C.) in which Philip V of Macedon defeated Sparta and her allies.

Social War. [Also: Marsic War.] War (90–88 B.C.) between Rome and most of her erstwhile Italian allies (socii) in C and S Italy, including the Marsi, Paeligni, Samnites, and Lucanians. It was caused by the refusal on the part of the Romans to extend the privileges of Roman citizenship to the allied peoples. The Italians formed a new republic with its capital at Corfinium. The chief Roman commanders were Marius and Sulla. Rome made concessions, granting citizenship to those who would stop fighting, and thus split the allies and suppressed the rebellion.

Socrates (sok'ra-tēz). Greek philosopher, born at Alopece in Attica, c470 B.C.; died at Athens, 399 B.C. He was the son of Sophroniscus, a sculptor, and of Phaenarete, a midwife. He was not a prepossessing figure, having been compared in looks to a Silenus or satyr. His indifference to his outward appearance was well known throughout Athens. Equally well known were his indifference to bodily comforts, his splendid health, and his remarkable physical endurance. His marriage late in life to the shrewish Xanthippe, who bore him three sons, resulted in many apocryphal tales concerning her bad temper. He at first adopted his father's art; in the time of Pausanias a group of draped Graces by him was said still to have stood on the approach to the Acropolis. He soon, however, devoted himself entirely to the pursuit of philosophy, and became famous through the persistence and skill with which, in conversation with the Sophists and with everyone who would take part in the discussion, he conducted the analysis of philosophical and educational ideas ("the Socratic method"). This analysis consisted of a directed sequence of questions; the answers ideally would indicate that the knowledge of the subject belonged to all and that a good teacher could evoke the best from his disciples. However, he did not call himself a teacher and took no pay from his followers, as the Sophists did. Indeed, he claimed no special wisdom, and when he learned that the oracle of Delphi had named him as the wisest man in the world, he set out to find a wiser and prove the oracle wrong. In the end he concluded that the oracle was perhaps right, for he was wisest in that he knew the extent of his ignorance. He was above all a searcher after a knowledge of virtue (which indeed he identified with knowledge), and was in himself the noblest exponent of the ethical life of the Greeks. In the Peloponnesian War, he served at Potidaea (431 B.C.), where he saved the life of his brilliant pupil Alcibiades. He served also at Delium (424 B.C.), where Alcibiades saved his life, and at Amphipolis (422 B.C.). He was a member of the Council of 500 and of the Prytanies (406 B.C.), at which time he refused to call for a vote on the condemnation of the six generals who had won the battle of Arginusae but had failed to stop and rescue the men in the water from their own wrecked ships. Socrates refused because it was against the law to try the generals collectively in the first place. He did not flee from Athens when the government was taken over by the Thirty Tyrants, but in 404 B.C., at the risk of his life, he defied their orders to arrest Leon the Salaminian. He is the chief character in the dialogues of Plato, in which his teachings are set forth (greatly modified by Plato's own views), and is the subject of the Memorabilia of Xenophon. Socrates left no writings of his own. His most famous pupils were Plato, Xenophon, and Alcibiades. He was bitterly attacked by Aristophanes as a Sophist and innovator, and drew upon himself by his mode of life and the character of his opinions the enmity of many others. In 399 B.C. he was accused of impiety (the introduction of new gods) and of corrupting the youth. His chief accuser was an obscure man, one Meletus, but behind him was Anytus. It was true Socrates questioned accepted religious practice, as he questioned everything. It was also true that he had a profound effect on the young men of his day who were his followers. Anytus had a son who was an ardent admirer of Socrates. Anytus forbade him to take part with others in the discussions presided over by Socrates, and the young man neither pursued his philosophical interests nor any profession suggested by his father. He took to drink. Anytus was a prominent democrat, a patriot who had helped to overthrow the tyrants. When his voice was added to others who accused Socrates he was brought to trial. Socrates could have avoided the trial by leaving Attica when the charges were brought against him, as many confidently expected him to do. Failing that, he might have won acquittal if he had used his skill in argument or the influence of his friends to deny the charges. He did neither. He was now an old man of 70. He had spent his life, except for periods of military service, in the Athens he loved. The defense he spread before his 501 judges, artistically recreated by Plato in his Apology, was no defense. He easily refuted some of the wilder charges, but on the main accusations he refused to make a defense. An inner voice, a personal daemon or divine inspiration, he said, spoke to him, exhorting him to seek the truth, and warning him against any evil or improper act. He would be compelled by his inner voice to continue his questioning, his search for truth, and his efforts to induce others to tend their souls. This was his life, his mission, and this he must carry out. His justification of his life and his expressed intention of continuing his practices alienated his judges and he was found guilty by a majority of 60. The penalty was death, but according to Athenian practice a defendant could propose a lighter penalty than that proposed by his judges. Socrates stated what all knew: that he was a poor man, and that for his services the state should really feed him at the public table in the Prytaneum. He proposed as an alternate penalty that he be fined 60 minae—a sum so ridiculously low that it was an insult to the judges, who now, by a much larger majority, imposed the death penalty. He was imprisoned in Athens, but execution of the sentence was delayed because of a law that no one should be put to death while the sacred ship of Athens was on its annual mission to Delos. It was a month before the ship returned. In that time Socrates' devoted friends visited him in his prison. Plato gives accounts of those visits and the conversations held in some of the dialogues, and in them expresses Socrates' teachings and ideas. One of the most moving documents of compassion, humanity, and greatness is the Crito. In it the aged Crito tries to persuade his old friend to flee and escape his sentence. Socrates leads him gently through all the old arguments he has maintained through a lifetime, and convinces him that such flight as Crito urges would be a denial of the principles he has been living by all his life, one of which is obedience to the law. He had been duly condemned under the laws of Athens, by which he had always lived. He would not deny them now. Crito sadly admits the justice of the argument and the triumph of the spirit which poses it, but his affections are not comforted. The Phaedo of Plato shows Socrates talking with his followers on the last day of his life. The subject of discussion is Socrates' unshakable belief in the immortality of the soul. When all points have been resolved the closing lines of the dialogue describe in homely detail the taking of the hemlock and, finally, the simplicity and serenity with which the aged philosopher brought his life to a close.

Sogdiana (sog-di-ā'nā). [Also: Sogdiane.] In ancient geography, a large region in C Asia, lying N of Bactriana, between the Oxus (modern Amu Darya) and Jaxartes (modern Syr Darya), in the vicinity of Bukhara and Samarkand. It was invaded by Alexander the Great.

Sol (sol). In Roman mythology, the name of the sun god, given to two separate deities. One, called Sol Indiges, was native, and became associated with Helius and Phoebus Apollo. The other was Sol Invictus, an epithet of the Indo-Iranian Mithra. His cult, a transplant from the East, by the 3rd century A.D. had become, if not the chief cult of Rome, at least equal in importance to the cult of Jupiter.

Soli (sō'li). In ancient geography, a city on the coast of Cilicia, Asia Minor, about 26 miles SW of Tarsus. It was destroyed by Tigranes of Armenia, and was rebuilt by Pompey and called Pompeiopolis. The corruptness of the Greek spoken there was proverbial, whence the word "solecism."

Solon (sō'lon). Athenian law-giver (born c638 B.C.; died, c559 B.C.). He was the son of Execestides, who claimed descent from the last Athenian king, Codrus. The family had been a wealthy as well as a noble one, but because his father had dissipated his fortune Solon was obliged to engage in trade. His business activity caused him to travel widely, especially in Ionia, and gave him contacts with and knowledge of foreign lands and rulers, as well as a wide experience of affairs. He built up his own fortune, not that he was an admirer of wealth, but he thought there was no odium attached to it if it were gained justly. His own comment on wealth was:

"For often evil men are rich, and good men poor;

But we will not exchange with them

While riches change their owners every day."

He was a cultivated man, and by his own account, a persistent seeker of wisdom, who grew old "ever learning new things." He wrote poetry, in the Ionic dialect, at first for his own amusement, but later and principally as a means of teaching and exhorting his fellow Athenians to pursue the course he thought they should follow, a course determined by Justice. Fragments of his poetry, the earliest surviving Athenian writings, are extant, and Athenian school-boys for generations after him learned his poems by heart. He early turned his attention to political ethics and to a consideration of improvement in the laws governing the Athenians. Plutarch mentions a conversation between Solon and one Anacharsis. The latter scoffed at Solon for his belief that injustice could be eliminated by law, for the laws, he said, are like spiders' webs: they entangle the weak but are torn to pieces by the strong. Solon replied that men would keep their agreements when they were convinced that it was to their advantage to do so.

As a statesman Solon realized that control of the island of Salamis, lying opposite the port of Athens, was essential for the safety of the city. Because previous attempts to win it from Megara had ended in failure and the Athenians were tired of the war, a law was passed in Athens forbidding the mention of the name Salamis. Solon considered this disgraceful. He composed a poem inciting the Athenians to "recover" Salamis and, pretending madness to evade the law, recited the poem in the agora and so aroused the ardor of the populace that an expedition was undertaken under his leadership. Some say that in obedience to a command of the oracle at Delphi he rowed across to the island at night and made sacrifices to propitiate the heroes of Salamis—Cychreus and Periphemus. He returned to Attica, gathered a force of 500 men and sailed against Salamis and captured the city (c600 B.C.), and erected a temple to Euryalius (Ares) on the promontory where he had landed. This, however, did not end the dispute between the people of Megara and Athens over control of Salamis, and the matter was submitted to a board of Spartan judges for arbitration. The Spartans awarded it to Athens, some say on the basis of these verses from the Iliad:

Ajax from Salamis led his warships; twelve was the number

(Led them and stationed them where the Athenians stood in battalions).

And some say they awarded Salamis to Athens because Solon proved to them that Eurysaces, son of Ajax, had become a citizen of Athens and had brought the island with him. In any case, Solon now became prominent in public affairs. In later times his defense of the temple of Apollo at Delphi against the people of Cirrha (c590? B.C.), added to his prestige. Many urged him to make himself tyrant but he refused, saying, "a tyranny is a lovely place but there is no way down from it."

In his time there was great social and political unrest in Athens. The three main parties were the Hill, that favored a democracy, the Plain, that favored an oligarchy, and the Shore, that fell somewhere in between.

Solon was well aware of the strife in the city and the reasons for it. Driven by greed, he exclaimed, the leaders enrich themselves unjustly, sparing neither the wealth of the state nor the temple treasures, and undermining the ancient foundations of justice. But, he declared, Justice, though silent, knows all the past and present, and never fails to come in time to punish. In 594 B.C. he became archon and was given broad powers to correct the abuses existing between the very rich and the very poor, and which were causing such unrest that civil war was threatened. These abuses, and the conflicts between classes, arose out of the impoverishment of the small landowners and the miserable condition of the free laborers. The small landowners were forced to pay such ruinous rates on money they borrowed that they were crushed, and, as Solon said, the black earth itself was enslaved. The free laborers received only one-sixth of what they produced as wages, and fell into debt in order to live. At this time a debtor who could not pay could be taken as a slave by his creditor. When Solon assumed office he immediately declared that debts which entailed slavery were annulled, and declared free those who had been enslaved according to previous contracts. This act, which freed many, was celebrated by a public feast. He made other reforms. He limited the area of land that could be owned by one person in order to curtail the growth of large estates; he forbade the exportation of Attic products, save for olive oil, because so much grain was exported by large proprietors for high prices that not enough remained to feed the population; and he made laws for the encouragement of trade and manufactures. In this time there were four tribes in Athens, named for the four sons of Ion: Geleon, Aegicores, Argades, and Hoples. Solon divided the people of the four tribes into four classes according to wealth, and assigned taxes and civic responsibility to each class in accordance with its ability to pay or participate. He reformed the constitution, the so-called constitution of Draco, retaining those features he considered good and changing others. By his reforms some political rights were granted to the peasants, who prior to this had been citizens with no rights; and he reconstituted the courts to give all four classes of citizens, chosen by lot, a share in the administration of justice. For this last alone he may be called the founder of Athenian democracy, for by it he gave the citizens some control over the administration which governed them, as public officials were answerable to the courts. He established the Council of 400, consisting of representatives from the three upper classes of the four tribes of Athens, to prepare the business of the Assembly; and he changed the function of the Council of the Areopagus, henceforth to be composed of former archons, to lessen its power. Public officers were to be chosen by lot and by election. Choosing by lot left the decision to the gods; it also insured that no class would have a monopoly. In some cases, a certain number of names were drawn and those so chosen in turn elected one of their number to office. In addition, a law was adopted that would disfranchise a citizen who refused to take sides in times of disagreement. The purpose of it was to compel the citizens to accept their civic responsibilities. Laws concerning the marriages of heiresses, wills, the dress of women, burial and mourning, were also adopted; all were designed to remove inequities or to eradicate excesses that had arisen, as in dress and mourning customs. Solon's laws were inscribed on wooden panels. Every citizen was required to swear to obey them, and they were to remain in force for 100 years.

Solon's reforms, based on his ideas of justice, satisfied no one. They antagonized the rich, who lost some of their property and power, and failed to satisfy the poor, who had hoped for the redistribution of the large estates and for the cancellation of their debts. Solon seems to have decided that there would be less pressure to tamper with his new laws if he were not there to be pressured. He therefore asked permission to leave Athens for ten years. In this time he traveled widely, visiting Egypt, Cyprus and probably Asia Minor. At Cyprus he helped the king to lay out a new city, which was called Soli in his honor. According to a story of Herodotus, in the course of his travels he visited Croesus, king of Lydia, who was at that time one of the richest and most powerful monarchs of the known world. Croesus thought the traveling Athenian, whose reputation for wisdom had preceded him, would surely be impressed by the wealth and power of the Lydian king. He therefore asked Solon to name the happiest man in the world, certain that his own name would be given in answer. Solon named an obscure Athenian, Tellus. To the shocked question of Croesus as to why this man was happiest, Solon replied it was because he had lived an honorable life, had children whom he lived to see grow up and have children of their own, and died a glorious death fighting for his country, for which he was given a public funeral and paid the highest honors by the Athenians. Croesus recovered his poise and asked Solon to name the second happiest man, thinking this time he would surely be named. Solon named Cleobis and Biton, because they had honored their mother and were rewarded with a peaceful death by the goddess Hera. Croesus now became angry; did Solon put so little value on his wealth and power that he rated Croesus even below ordinary men? Solon's reply was that no man can be called happy until his life has ended happily, for the gods are jealous of their power and will seek to bring misfortune to him who enjoys too great prosperity. Riches above the needs of man do not necessarily bring happiness, but a healthy man who has no misfortunes, who sees his children grow up, and who ends his life well, can be called happy. For, added Solon, "in every matter we must mark well the end; for oftentimes God gives men a gleam of happiness, and then plunges them into ruin." This story of Herodotus is undoubtedly apochryphal, for Solon left Athens shortly after he had been archon and was away only ten years. Croesus did not succeed to the throne of Lydia until 560 B.C. However, true or not, it illustrates an ethical and religious principle of the Greeks of the time and for some generations thereafter.

All of Solon's reforms had been made with the object of forestalling a tyranny and of restoring peace to Athens. In his last days he saw the city he had set on the road to democracy fall into the power of a tyrant in spite of his efforts. Pisistratus, a friend of Solon, seized control and established a tyranny (561 B.C.). The aged Solon, so it is said, went into the agora and urged the citizens to throw off the tyranny. The city, he cried, would not perish by the will of the gods but by the folly of her citizens. His words were not heeded. He went to his house and placed his arms before the door, saying he had done all he could for his country and its citizens must now do likewise. His friends feared for his life because of his open opposition to Pisistratus. They urged him to leave Athens and when he refused asked him on what he relied to protect him from the tyrant. "On my old age," he is said to have answered. He was in no danger however. Although their political views were opposed, Pisistratus retained his friendship and respect for Solon. He lived a full and enjoyable life in Athens, and ultimately was inscribed as one of the Seven Sages of Greece. When he died, c559 B.C., his body was burned and the ashes were scattered over the island of Salamis. His name has passed into the English language as a synonym for a legislator or a wise official. Solus (sō'lus). [Also: Soluntum.] In ancient geography, a city on the N coast of Sicily, about 12 miles SE of Panormus. It was an ancient Phoenician colony.

Solymi (sol'i-mi). In Greek legend, famed warriors of Asia Minor. Proetus, desiring to get rid of Bellerophon but not willing to slay him because he had come as a guest, sent Bellerophon to fight the Solymi with the idea that he would surely be killed. Contrary to his expectations, Bellerophon conquered them.

Somnus (som'nus). In Roman mythology, the personification and god of sleep. He became identified with the Greek Hypnos. He was a twin brother of Death (Mors or Thanatos) and a son of Nyx. In art the two are represented alike as youths, often sleeping or holding inverted torches. See Sleep.

Sophilus (sof'i-lus). Athenian potter and vase-painter in the black-figure style, active at the end of the 7th and the beginning of the 6th century B.C. His signature has been preserved on the fragments of three vases. A fragment from a large mixing bowl (Athens), signed "Sophilus made me," shows a chariot race on the shoulder, and is inscribed "Patroclus' funeral games," a rare instance of a vase-painter giving a title to his painting. Spectators watching the race sit in a grandstand. Beside one of the spectators the name Achilles is inscribed.

Sophocles (sof'ō-klēz). One of the three great tragic poets of Greece, ranked with Aeschylus, his older contemporary, and Euripides, his younger contemporary. He was born, 496 B.C., at Colonus, in Attica; died 406 B.C. Sophillus (or Sophilus), his father, was a wealthy Athenian citizen and gave him a sound education in music, gymnastics, and dancing. He appears to have been noted for his youthful beauty, and was chosen to lead the chorus in the paeon of thanksgiving for the victory at Salamis (480 B.C.). According to some accounts, he took the part of Thamyras the blind musician in one of his plays, and in another he played the part of the young princess Nausicaä. In his long life he several times held public office, perhaps partly as an acknowledgment of his fame as a dramatist and his genial qualities as a man. In 440 B.C. he was appointed one of the generals in the war which Pericles led against Samos, and in 413 B.C. he was one of the Ten Commissioners appointed, after the failure of the expedition to Sicily, to govern Athens. He seems to have made singularly few enemies, to have lived serenely, enjoying the respect and affection of his fellow citizens to the end of his long life. In his last years, so it is said, his older son, Iophon, became jealous of the affection Sophocles had for his grandson Sophocles, son of Iophon's half-brother. Iophon sought to have the administration of his father's thriving financial affairs turned over to him, on the ground that his father was mentally incompetent. Sophocles is said to have convinced the judges of the soundness of his mind by reading to them an ode from his Oedipus at Colonus, which he was then writing. Some say, however, that this tale is a fiction invented by the comic poets, and maintain that the poet lived in rare tranquillity to the end of his days.

Sophocles first won first prize, in competition with Aeschylus, in 468 B.C. He won first prize 20 times, second prize many more times, and was never awarded anything lower than that. Of the more than 120 tragedies he wrote, known by title or from fragments, only seven have survived intact. They are: Ajax, perhaps the earliest of the extant plays, about the humiliation and suicide of the valiant warrior; Antigone, c.440 B.C., from the saga of the Labdacids, which presents the conflict between the claims of the state and those of a higher, spiritual realm; Oedipus Rex (or Oedipus the King, Oedipus Tyrannus), which seems to be a later play than the Antigone (but the events of which precede it in the Theban saga) and which was considered by Aristotle as a perfect tragedy; Electra, on a subject with which both Aeschylus and Euripides concerned themselves; Women of Trachis, about Deianira's love for Heracles, the sorrow it caused her, and the hero's death; Philoctetes, produced 409 B.C., which presents young Neoptolemus, directed by crafty Odysseus, in an attempt to persuade Philoctetes to join the Greeks before Troy; and Oedipus at Colonus, produced by Sophocles' son in 401 B.C., concerning the mystic end of Oedipus. A long fragment of a satyr play, Ichneutae (The Trackers), is also extant. This tells about the search for Apollo's cattle, stolen from him by the new-born infant Hermes.

To the form of tragedy Sophocles added scene painting and a third actor. He increased the number of the chorus from 12 to 15 and reduced the proportion of the play given to the chorus, thereby accelerating the progress of the action. He did not write trilogies, as Aeschylus had done; each play is complete in itself. Sophocles was greatly admired by the ancients, and ever since, as a master of form, for the drive and directness with which his tragedies march to a conclusion, for his character drawing and for dramatic irony. He presented the sagas around which all tragedies were required to be written without comment, molding them by technical skill and transmuting them by genius. The ancients respected him for his calm and steady adherence to the traditional religion. His works, stunning in their effectiveness, glowing in their poetry, did not lacerate, as did those of Euripides, the quivering and vulnerable sensibilities of the audience. All his tragic figures were noble in their suffering. Of Euripides, Sophocles is reputed to have said, "He paints men as they are," implying that they are presented with all their doubts and waverings, all the conflicting impulses of human weakness and strength. Of himself, Sophocles said, "I paint men as they ought to be." His characters are the possessors of a few strongly etched qualities which, given a particular set of circumstances, make the end inevitable. Oedipus is brave, rash, persistent. He determines to learn the truth about the murderer of Laius. He is not hampered in his search for the truth by an imagination that would hint to him how unfortunate that truth might be. With the utmost concentration and power, with no vitiating philosophical digressions, the play marches inexorably to the overwhelming moment when Oedipus learns the truth. Having learned it, he suffers as intensely as he had pursued it. The work of Sophocles was considered the very perfection of tragedy. After his death it became the criterion and ideal of classic tragedy. He died in 406 B.C., before the final defeat of Athens by Sparta in the Peloponnesian Wars. After his death the Spartans under Lysander invaded Athens. According to legend, Dionysus appeared to Lysander in a dream and commanded him to honor with all the usual honors of the dead the new siren. As a result of the vision Lysander granted a truce, and the poet was buried on the road to Decelea, where an image of a siren marked his tomb. The Athenians worshiped him as a hero and offered annual sacrifice to him.

Sophonisba (sof-ō-niz'ba) Carthaginian woman; died c204 B.C. She was a daughter of Hasdrubal, son of Gisco. She was betrothed to the Numidian prince Masinissa, but was afterward married in 206 B.C., for political reasons, to Syphax, the rival Numidian ruler. Her husband was defeated by Masinissa, who acted as an ally of the Romans while Syphax was an ally of the Carthaginians, in the Second Punic War. Sophonisba fell into the hands of the conqueror, who married her, but was compelled by Scipio to reject her. She committed suicide by poison sent by Masinissa to prevent her from falling into the hands of the Romans. She has been the subject of many tragedies.

Sophron (sō'fron). Syracusan writer of comedy; fl. c440 B.C. He was noted for his mimes—usually humorous studies of little scenes from daily life. He wrote in some kind of rhythmical prose which the ancients considered poetry. Only fragments of his works have survived.

Sora (sō'rā). Town of C Italy, situated on the upper Liris river, about 62 miles SE of Rome. It was an ancient Volscian town. The Romans captured it three times, in 345, 314, and 305 B.C. In 303 B.C. they finally secured its annexation to Rome by sending a strong colony there. In the time of Augustus, soldiers from the Fourth Legion colonized it.

Soracte (sō-rak'tē). [Italian, Monte Soratto, Monte Sant'Oreste.] Mountain in Italy, near the Tiber river, about 25 miles NE of Rome. There is an extensive view from its summit, and it was known in ancient times for its temple of Apollo. Elevation, 2260 feet.

Sosias (sō'si-as). Attic potter, active at the beginning of the 5th century B.C. The painter who decorated his work, in the red-figure style, is known as the Sosias Painter. Of two works definitely attributed to him, a kylix (Berlin) shows Achilles binding up the wounds of Patroclus and is admired for the subject and the concentrated rendering thereof.

Sosigenes (sō-sij'e-nēz). Alexandrian astronomer; fl. in the 1st century B.C. At the bidding of Julius Caesar, he devised (47 B.C.) a solar calendar. His calendar was based on the fixed 365-day solar calendar of the Egyptians, but unlike the Egyptian calendar, provided an intercalary day every fourth year, the antecedent of our Leap Year, to absorb the fractional day (assumed to be 0.2500 day; the correct figure is c0.2425 day) of the solar cycle. As the Julian Calendar, this was adopted as the official calendar of the Roman state and passed into western Europe generally, and continued in use unchanged until the 16th century, when the slowly accumulating error amounted to 11 days. In 1582 A.D. Pope Gregory XIII ordered that the calendar be adjusted by omitting 11 days, and provided a corrected intercalation which will hold the calendar in agreement with the tropical year for several thousand years to come. As the Gregorian Calendar, this is the calendar by which we reckon time today. Sosigenes was also the author of various astronomical works, including one on Revolving Spheres, but of these only isolated fragments remain. (JJ)

Sosipolis (sō-sip'ō-lis). Native deity of Elis, worshiped in the sanctuary of Ilithyia at the foot of Mount Cronus at Olympia. The deity was tended by an old woman, who brought water for his bath and fed him barley cakes kneaded with honey. The story of Sosipolis is that the Arcadians invaded Elis. A woman holding an infant to her breast came to the Elean generals, in obedience to a command given her in a dream, and offered her child to fight for the Eleans. The Elean generals placed the naked child in front of their army. When the Arcadians advanced, the infant was transformed into a writhing serpent before their eyes. The Arcadians were thrown into confusion by this miracle and were defeated by the Eleans. On the spot where the serpent went into the ground the Eleans raised a sanctuary and named the god Sosipolis (Savior of the State), and decided to worship Ilithyia the birth-goddess with him because she brings sons to help men.

Sospita (sos'pi-tā). In Roman mythology, an epithet of Juno as a goddess of healing.

Soter (sō'tēr). Epithet of Zeus, meaning "Savior." When Heracles went to Nemea to slay the lion, he stopped at the house of one Molorchus, whose son had been killed by the lion. Molorchus was about to sacrifice a ram to Hera. Heracles asked him to wait, and if he did not return at the end of 30 days to sacrifice to him as a hero, but if he did return, he promised Molorchus that together they would sacrifice to Zeus Soter. When he had killed the lion, he returned to the house of Molorchus on the thirtieth day and found him preparing to sacrifice to Heracles as a hero. Instead, they sacrificed together to Zeus Soter. Of the bronze image of Zeus Soter in Thespieae the story is told that there was a dragon that used to ravage the countryside. In obedience to a command of a god, a youth was sacrificed to the dragon each year to appease it and prevent it from attacking the city. At last a youth volunteered to be sacrificed in order to save his beloved friend, whose name had been drawn by lot. The youth who volunteered made himself a breastplate, the outside of which was covered with fishhooks with the barbs turned out. The idea was that when the dragon swallowed him he would be killed by the fishhooks, and though the youth himself would be killed, in future his countrymen would be safe. There were many sanctuaries of Zeus Soter, as at Troezen, Epidaurus, Aegium in Achaea, Mantinea and Megalopolis in Arcadia, and in Messenia.

Soter. Epithet of various Greek gods referring to their power to save from peril. In Hellenistic times it was also applied to various rulers in Egypt, Syria, and in other areas where Greek culture had made itself felt. Ptolemy I of Egypt was perhaps the most famous mortal recipient of the title.

Sounion (sōn'yōn). See Sunium.

Sown Men. See Sparti.

Sparrow. Bird sometimes considered to be sacred to Aphrodite.

Sparta (spār'tā). Ancient city in Laconia, Greece, situated on the Eurotas River. From the city the entire kingdom (which was called Lacedaemon as well as Laconia and Laconica) came to be known as Sparta. According to some accounts, Sparta was a daughter of Eurotas, for whom the river was named. She married Lacedaemon, son of Zeus and Taÿgete, and he inherited his father-in-law's kingdom. Lacedaemon founded a city which he named Sparta for his wife, and ultimately the whole kingdom took her name. According to Homer, this city of Sparta was one of those most loved by Hera. Sparta was famous in myth and legend. Among the many monuments of the ancient city were the grave of Orestes near a sanctuary of the Fates; a sanctuary of Athena Celeuthea (Lady of the Road) founded by Odysseus in gratitude for having won the race in Sparta by which he also won Penelope for his bride; the Hellenium, in which, some say, the Greeks deliberated before sailing to Troy to secure the return of Helen (and others say the Greeks deliberated here when they were preparing to repel Xerxes in 480 B.C.). Near the Hellenium was the tomb of Agamemnon's herald Talthibius. And there were many other sites and monuments connected with mythological and legendary figures, as well as many religious sites. The famous temple of Athena of the Bronze House, said to have been begun by Tyndareus, was on the acropolis at Sparta. Legend says that Heracles attacked Sparta, to punish Hippocoön and his sons, and that, being successful, he restored Tyndareus, foster father of Helen, to the throne and left the kingdom in trust for his sons and descendants. Menelaus succeeded his father-in-law as king of Sparta. To avenge the wrong to their king when Helen was carried off by Paris, many men from Sparta took part in the Trojan War. On the earlier conquest of Heracles the Heraclidae (Dorians) based their claim to Sparta when, under the sons of Aristomachus (a descendant of Heracles), they invaded the Peloponnesus. The Spartans claimed it was Aristodemus himself, the son of Aristomachus, who marched into the Peloponnesus and claimed Sparta; but others say he had died on the eve of the invasion, and that it was his twin sons, Procles and Eurysthenes, who won Sparta as their territory in the drawing of the lots with their uncles Cresphontes and Temenus. It was for this reason (that Procles and Eurysthenes shared the throne), that Sparta alone of the Greek states had two kings and two royal houses.

By the legislation of the semi-legendary Lycurgus, Sparta became a powerful state. A conservative, aristocratic governmental system was developed, in which every moment of the lives of its citizens was strictly regulated. The purpose of the regulation was to develop a nation continually poised for war. In this Sparta was eminently successful. In the first place, the citizen was freed from the necessity of gaining his livelihood. The land was divided into lots. Each Spartan obtained a lot, which then belonged irrevocably to him and his descendants. It could not be sold or divided. The land was cultivated by the helots, virtual slaves, who belonged to the Spartan master and could not be either sold or freed by him; but under certain circumstances the state might emancipate a helot. Of the produce which the helots drew from the land certain amounts of grain, wine, and fruit went to the Spartan lot-holder. Any over these specified amounts was left to the helots who cultivated the land. Trade and commerce were carried on by the Perioeci (Dwellers-around) who, though free, enjoyed none of the rights of citizenship. Thus the Spartan citizen was free to devote himself to the service of the state. When a child was born it was examined by representatives of the state, and if it was found to be weak or imperfect it was exposed on Mount Taygetus to die. At the age of seven years boys were given into the care of the state, and their training was entirely directed to the ends of complete obedience and the cultivation of devotion to the state. This training was supported by exposing the children to all sorts of hardships to strengthen them and make them invulnerable to hardships. A well-known story of Spartan self-control and self-discipline is of the Spartan boy who stole a fox, hid it under his cloak, and stood motionless and silent while the fox gnawed at his vitals. At the age of 20, Spartan youths were permitted to marry, but since at the same time they entered military service and were compelled to live in barracks, they could not enjoy a home or family life. At 30 the Spartan was considered a man and won the full rights of citizenship. Thenceforward however, they continued to eat with their army comrades at public messes. Spartan women were also subjected to a discipline by the state. They were encouraged to develop their bodies in gymnastic exercises, so that they might bear strong sons. Their devotion to their country surpassed their maternal instinct. In the development of Sparta as an armed camp there was no place for luxury or soft living, and Spartan simplicity became proverbial. As a further effect, the concentration on developing superb soldiers left no room for the encouragement of original thinkers—poets, dramatists, artists. The valor of the Spartan fighting man also became proverbial. The Greeks in general, for centuries, could not imagine a Spartan surrender or a Spartan captive. The death of the 300 Spartans under Leonidas at Thermopylae (480 B.C.) was considered typical of the Spartan way in war, and illustrated on a large scale the command of the Spartan matron to her son about to go to war, to come back with his shield or on it. Yet contrary to expectation, though always in a state of preparedness, Sparta was reluctant to initiate war and, on the whole, rather slow to engage in it even when her own interest was manifestly affected. In the 8th and 7th centuries B.C. Messenia was conquered. Arcadia, Messenian ally, later acknowledged Spartan supremacy. In the 6th century B.C. Sparta succeeded in conquering Tegea, the most powerful of the Arcadian cities. According to legend, Tegea had previously been invulnerable to Spartan attacks. An oracle told the Spartans they must bring back the bones of Orestes to Sparta if they would conquer Tegea. When this was accomplished, through the agency of the Spartan Lichas, Tegea was overwhelmed.

By the middle of the 6th century B.C. Sparta had established its supremacy over Argos, and was the leading Greek state and acknowledged as such by the other states. The Spartans had an alliance with Croesus. When the Ionian cities revolted they sought, in vain, the aid of Sparta. When the Persian invasion threatened (490 B.C.), the Spartans were prevented by a religious holiday from assisting the Athenians at Marathon. By the time the holiday was over and the Spartans came hurrying up, the Athenians had utterly routed the Persian forces. The Spartans were filled with admiration, and closely examined the battlefield where the great victory had taken place. With the approach of the second Persian invasion (480 B.C.), Sparta was the acknowledged leader of the Greeks and played a leading part in the Persian War and the Greek victory therein. After the Persian War Sparta retained its place as the leading land power, but the sea power of Athens had developed and now seemed to threaten Spartan supremacy. With various allies, Sparta fought against Athens in the Peloponnesian Wars (431-404 B.C.) and emerged victorious. The years 404-371 B.C. followed as the period of Spartan hegemony in Greece. At the height of its power the city of Sparta remained unwallled. It is said that when someone asked Agesilaus, the Spartan king (398 B.C.) why Sparta was unwallled, he pointed to the citizens in arms and replied, "These are the walls of Lacedaemon." But the period of Spartan ascendancy was short. Sparta had many enemies, and the arid military policy prevented the natural growth of the state. In 371 B.C. the Spartans were defeated at the battle of Leuctra by the Thebans under Epaminondas. At this time the two stars symbolizing the Dioscuri, patrons of Sparta, fell from their place in the temple and disappeared forever. This was the end of Spartan power. Sparta passed under Roman rule in 146 B.C.

Spartacus (spär'ta-kus). Thracian who became a Roman slave and gladiator at Capua. He headed an insurrection of slaves (Servile War) in Italy in 73 B.C., and routed several Roman armies, but was ultimately defeated by Crassus on the Silarus River and slain (71 B.C.).

Sparti (spär'ti). In Greek mythology, a race of fully-armed men that sprang from the soil when Cadmus sowed the dragon's teeth. The name means "the Sown Men." Cadmus hurled stones into their midst when they sprang from the earth and they fell upon each other and fought until only five survived. These five: Chthonius, Echion, Hyperenor, Pelorus, and Udaeus, became the ancestors of the noble families of Thebes.

Spelaïtes (spē-lā'i-tēz). An epithet of Hermes, meaning "Of the Cave." The people of Themisonium gave him this epithet because when they were being attacked, Hermes appeared to their generals in a dream and told them where to find a cave in which they should hide their women and children for safety. As Apollo and Heracles also appeared in the same dream, they too had this epithet.

Sperchius (sper-kī'us). [Also: Hellada, Spercheius, Sperkhios.] River that rises in Mount Othrys and flows through Thessaly into the Gulf of Lamia near Thermopylae. In Homeric legend (Iliad), the river-god Sperchius was the father of Menesthius by Polydora. Peleus, the father of Achilles, swore he would sacrifice Achilles' hair to the river if Achilles returned safely from the Trojan War. Knowing he would not return, Achilles cut off his hair and burned it on the pyre of Patroclus.

Spermo (spēr'mō). In Greek mythology, one of the three daughters of Anius, king of Delos. She was given the power by Dionysus to turn whatever she wished into grain. See Elaïs.

Sperthias (spēr'thi-as) and Bulis (bū'lis). Two Spartans. According to Herodotus, Darius the Great sent heralds to Sparta demanding earth and water from the Spartans as a token that they submitted to him. The Spartans cast the heralds into a well and told them to fetch their own earth and water. This was a violation of the immemorial sanctity, recognized by all nations, of the persons of heralds. The descendants of Talthybius, Agamemnon's herald, who held the hereditary right to the office of herald in Sparta, went to the temple of Talthybius there and called down his wrath on the Spartans. Thenceforth victims at sacrifices failed to give good omens. After this had gone on a long time the Spartans were extremely troubled. They called for two Spartans willing to give their lives for their country. Sperthias and Bulis, Spartan noblemen, offered themselves. They volunteered to go to Xerxes, son of Darius and present ruler of Persia, and submit to death at his hands to atone for the deaths of the Persian heralds at the hands of the Spartans. On their way to Susa they were received by the satrap Hydarnes. He pointed out to them many evidences of the advantages accruing to the friends of the Persian ruler, and asked them why they would not consent to become friends with Xerxes. They replied that he knew only half the story. Having always been a slave he was pleased to live in comfort, but if he had ever tasted liberty, such as they knew, he would urge them to fight to the death to retain it. Leaving Hydarnes, they went to Susa. There they refused to bow their heads before Xerxes, claiming that they worshiped no man, that this was not why they had come to Susa, and repelling with force those who sought to compel them to make obeisance to Xerxes. They addressed him, telling him they had come to give their lives to atone for the Persian heralds slain by the Spartans. Xerxes, "with true greatness of soul," according to Herodotus, answered that he would not do as the Spartans had done. He would not break the laws honored by men of all nations regarding the persons of heralds. He allowed Sperthias and Bulis to return home, and because of their noble willingness to die the anger of Talthybius was temporarily appeased, only to rise up again and visit itself on the sons of Sperthias and Bulis 60 years later.

Speusippus (spū-sip'us). Athenian philosopher; born c407 B.C.; died 339 B.C. He was a nephew and disciple of Plato, and became head of the Academy after Plato's death (347 B.C.). Only stray fragments of his work survive which testify to his interest in mathematical theory, ethics, and biological investigation.

Sphacteria (sfak-tir'i-a). [Also: Sphakteria, Sphagia.] Small island off the promontory of Messenian Pylus. Here the Spartans were cut off by the Athenians. They took refuge on what was thought to be an impregnable height at one end of the island. Their ancient enemies the Messenians, who were aiding the Athenians, discovered a perilous path up the cliffs in the rear of the Spartan position. They led the Athenians up the cliffs so that they now commanded the rear as well as the van of the Spartans and the Spartans surrendered (425 B.C.). Though the force of Spartans that surrendered was comparatively small, the victory was enormous, for up to this time the Spartans had such a reputation for fighting to the death that it was thought they were never taken alive. A bronze shield, found in a cistern near the temple of Hephaestus in Athens, bears an inscription recording its dedication by the Athenians, "from the Lacedaemonians at Pylus."

Sphinx (sfings). In Greek mythology, the monstrous daughter of Echidna and Orthrus, or as some say, of Echidna and Typhon. She had the head of a woman, the body of a lion, the tail of a serpent, and eagle's wings. The Sphinx was sent by Hera or Apollo to punish Thebes for the crimes of Laius, king of Thebes. She frequented a high rock near the gate of Thebes and waylaid passers-by, asking them: "What creature with one voice walks on four legs in the morning, on two at noon, and on three in the evening?" She hurled those who could not answer the riddle to their deaths from her rock, or as some say, she devoured them. When Oedipus came to Thebes, he answered correctly: "Man, who crawls on all fours as a babe, walks upright in his prime, and needs a staff in old age." The Sphinx thereupon perished (or killed herself), and Oedipus entered Thebes as deliverer of the people from the monster.

Spodius (spō'di-us). An epithet of Apollo,

meaning "God of Ashes," for the ashes of sacrificial victims.

Spoletium (spō-lē'shum). [Modern name, Spoleto.] Town of C Italy, situated on a branch of the Via Flaminia, about 60 miles NE of Rome. It was attacked (217 B.C.) by Hannibal after the battle of Trasimene, but he was driven off. The town was a battleground during the civil wars and its territory was annexed by Sulla, 82 B.C. Under the empire it again became a prosperous town. There are many Roman remains in Spoletium, including a theater, amphitheater, bridge, a triumphal arch of Drusus and Germanicus (21 A.D.), houses, and parts of walls.

Spoleto (spō-lā'tō). See Spoletium.

Sporades (spor'ā-dēz). Group of Greek islands in the Aegean and neighboring seas. The name is variously applied. It includes Melos, Thera, Cos, and others, and sometimes Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and others.

Sporus (spō'rus). Favorite of the emperor Nero. He was a beautiful youth of slave parentage, and is said to have possessed a striking resemblance to Nero's wife Poppaea Sabina. After her death in 65 A.D., Nero had him castrated and dressed as a woman, and gave him the name of Sabina, publicly going through the ceremony of marriage with him in Greece in 67. Sporus fled with Nero from Rome on the insurrection of Galba in the following year, and was reputedly present at his suicide. He was afterward intimate with the emperor Otho, a former companion in debauchery of Nero, and ultimately, under Vitellius, committed suicide to avoid the indignity of appearing as a girl on the stage.

Squillace (skwēl-lā'chā). See Scylacium.

Stagira (stā-jī'rā). [Also: Stagirus.] In ancient geography, a city on the coast of Chalcidice, Macedonia, about 43 miles E of Thessalonika: the birthplace of Aristotle. It was colonized from Andros.

Stagirite (stā-jī'rīt). See Aristotle.

Stamnos (stām'nos). In ancient Greece, a large water- or wine-vase closely resembling the hydria, but generally with a shorter neck, and provided merely with the two small handles on the sides of the paunch, the larger handle behind being absent.

Stamphane (stām'fā-ne) or Stamphanes (stām'fā-nes). See Strophades.

Staphylus (staf'i-lus). In Greek mythology, a son of Dionysus and Ariadne. He inherited the island of Peparethos from Minos of Crete. Staphylus married Chrysothemis, who bore him three daughters, Molpadia, Rhoeo, and Parthenos.

Statira (stā-tī'rā). Wife of Artaxerxes II Mnemon (c436-358 B.C.), king of Persia. She was put to death by Parysatis.

Statira. Wife of Darius III (Codomannus), the Great King of Persia; died c333 B.C. At the battle of Issus (333 B.C.), Alexander completely defeated the forces of Darius. He fled, abandoning his mother, wife, and children in his pavilion near the battlefield. Alexander pursued him and retrieved the cloak and armor that Darius discarded in his flight. When Alexander returned with them to his camp he heard the wailing of women and learned that the wife and family of Darius had become his captives, and that they grieved, thinking Alexander had slain Darius because he returned to the camp with the accoutrements of Darius. Alexander sent word to comfort them, saying that Darius had escaped and still lived. He also assured the women that he would accord them every honor and service due to their royal state. Statira was reputed to be the most beautiful princess then living but Alexander did not molest her in any way. On the contrary, he did not seek her out but gave orders for her comfort. She died in childbirth while still Alexander's captive.

Statira. Daughter of Darius III (Codomannus); slain 323 B.C. On his return journey from India Alexander the Great married her at Susa (324 B.C.). When Alexander died (323 B.C.), Roxana, another of his wives, sent for Statira, who did not know he was dead. Roxana murdered Statira and her sister and flung their bodies into a well and covered them with earth.

Statius (stā'shus), Publius Papinius. Roman poet; born c45 A.D., at Naples; died c96. His father, who was also a poet, gave him his training. Statius became court poet to Domitian, on whose favor he depended, and whose good will he kept by means of the most sycophantic flattery. He wrote the epic Thebais, in 12 books, on the struggles of the sons of Oedipus to win control of Thebes, and an unfinished epic called Achilleis. His miscellaneous poems appeared in the collection called Silvae.

Statius Caecilius (sē-sil'i-us). See Caecilius Statius.

Stator (stā'tôr). Epithet of the Roman god Jupiter as the stayer of flight, especially the flight of armies.

Stentor (sten'tôr). In Greek legend, a Greek herald before Troy, who, in Homer's Iliad, had a voice as loud as those of 50 men together. The adjective "stentorian" is derived from his name.

Stenyclaros (sten-i-klā'ros). [Also: Stenyclerus, Stenyclarus.] In ancient geography, a city in Messenia. Cresphontes, who won Messenia as his share of the Peloponnesus in the return of the Heraclidae (Dorian invasion), built his palace there and made it his capital. In Stenyclaros was the Boar's Tomb where, some say, Heracles took an oath on slices of boar's flesh. A great battle between the Spartans and Messenians was fought at the Boar's Tomb in the Second Messenian War, in which the Spartans were put to rout, but Aristomenes, the Messenian commander, was prevented by the Dioscuri from pursuing them. The Dioscuri sat in a wild pear tree and caused Aristomenes to lose his shield. While he hunted for it the Spartans escaped.

Stepteria (step-tē'ri-ā). A ritualistic festival commemorating the slaying by Apollo of the Pytho that guarded the oracular chasm at Delphi. The ceremony was reenacted every eighth year. According to the ritual, a hut of boughs was set up on the threshing-floor at Delphi. A boy, both of whose parents were living, was selected to enact the chief role. He went to the hut with his companions, upset the table for offerings within, destroyed the hut by fire and, presumably, destroyed the serpent whose house the hut was as well. The youth then fled to Tempe, where he underwent purification rites, and then, crowned with a laurel wreath, was led back to Delphi in a sacred procession.

Stereobate (stēr'e-ō-bāt). In architecture, the substructure, foundation, or solid platform upon which a building is erected. In columnar buildings it includes the stylobate, which is the uppermost step or platform of the foundation upon which the columns stand.

Sterope (stēr'ō-pē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pleione and Atlas; one of the Pleiades. She was the mother of Oenomaus by Ares. With her sisters, her image was placed among the stars. She is also known as Asterope. See Pleiades.

Steropes (stēr'ō-pēz). In Greek mythology, one of the Cyclopes, a son of Gaea and Uranus. His brothers were Arges and Brontes. See Cyclopes.

Stesichorus (stē-sik'ō-rus). Great lyric poet who was active in the middle of the 6th century B.C. His name was originally Tisias but he was given the name Stesichorus (marshal of choruses) in recognition of his office as director of choruses. He was a Locrian who went to Himera in Sicily and ultimately retired to Catana when the tyrant Phalaris triumphed. The eight-sided grave of Stesichorus, outside the gate named for him, was pointed out as one of the sights of Sicily in Roman times. Among the great contributions of Stesichorus were his invention of the simple narrative style of lyric and his transporting of the epic to the west. But his greatest contribution was in his lyrical recording and remodelling of the myths, especially those of Thebes and Troy. In a critical spirit, but with perfect faith, he set down the great stories, altering the details as it seemed good to him but never doubting that what he wrote about had really happened. Later poets took the versions of the stories, and the incidents and episodes he added, as their point of departure. An outstanding example of his willingness to alter the epics, as well as an example of his faith, is in his story of Helen of Troy. An early poem of Helen, now lost, apparently took the usual view that Helen had too easily succumbed to the temptations presented by Paris, had betrayed her husband and her country, and had wantonly provoked a long and disastrous war. Later in his life Stesichorus went blind. He thought this was a punishment on him from Helen for the scandalous things he had written about her. Besides, by this time it had begun to seem incredible that the Trojans would allow their kingdom to be destroyed just to indulge Paris. Like others after him, Stesichorus began to think that the Trojans did not give up Helen to the Greeks because she was not in their midst, that she had never gone to Troy at all. According to some accounts, a citizen of Croton who had gone to the island of Leuce to be cured of a wound by the shade of Ajax the Lesser, had there seen Helen, now married to Achilles. She commanded the Crotoniat to take a message to Stesichorus, saying that the loss of his sight was due to her displeasure because he had libelled her. Stesichorus, on receiving the message, recanted. He wrote a Palinode (a poetic recantation) which commenced, "That tale was never true! Thou didst not go aboard the well-benched ships, nor reach the towers of Troy." A public declamation by Stesichorus of these verses appeased the anger of Helen and his sight was restored. He was the first to advance the theory, for the above reasons, that Helen did not go to Troy at all, that the war was fought for a phantom, a wraith carried off by Paris, while the true Helen was living virtuously in Egypt. Stesichorus was tremendously admired by the ancients, who called him "the lyric Homer." Only fragments of his work survive.

Stesimbrotus (stes-im'brō-tus). Greek biographer; born on the island of Thasus; fl. at the end of the 5th century B.C. He was a contemporary of Cimon and Pericles. He went to Athens in the time of Pericles and wrote biographies on political figures in Athens: Themistocles, Pericles, and Thucydides. He was, not unnaturally since the Athenians had compelled Thasus to remain in the confederacy, violently opposed to the Athenian empire and much of his work was devoted to attacks against it.

Stheneboea (sthen-e-bē'a). The name sometimes given to the daughter of Iobates, king of Lycia, who married Proetus of Corinth and falsely accused Bellerophon. See Antia.

Sthenelaus (sthen-e-lā'us). In the Iliad, a Trojan who was slain by Patroclus.

Sthenele (sthen'e-lē). A daughter of Acastus. According to some accounts, she was the mother of Patroclus by Menoetius.

Sthenelus (sthen'e-lus). In Greek legend, a son of Actor. He was a comrade of Heracles in the war against the Amazons, and was struck by an arrow and wounded. On his return to Paphlagonia he died of his wound and passed to the Underworld. When the Argonauts passed his burial mound on their way to Colchis, Persephone yielded to his request to go from the world of the dead to the world of the living so that he could see once more heroes such as he used to be. The Argonauts stopped when they saw his spirit looking at their ship, and at the urging of Mopsus sacrificed to his spirit, after which his spirit returned to the world of the dead.

Sthenelus. In Greek legend, a son of Capaneus. He was one of the Epigoni, sons of the Seven against Thebes, and one who returned safely. As a close friend of Diomedes, "to his heart, the dearest of mortals," he went with Diomedes from Argos to fight with the Greeks in the Trojan War. When Diomedes was wounded by Pandarus, Sthenelus pulled out the arrow that had lodged in his shoulder. With Diomedes, he swore that he would stay and fight at Troy until the city was destroyed, even if Agamemnon should, as he proposed doing, induce the Greeks to withdraw and go home. Sthenelus was one of those who later entered Troy in the Wooden Horse.

Sthenelus. In Greek legend, a son of Perseus and Andromeda. He seized the throne of Mycenae, after banishing Amphitryon. When Atreus and Thyestes fled from the Peloponnesus he invited them to Mycenae, thus paving the way for the rule of the Pelopids, or the House of Atreus, over Mycenae. His wife Nicippe was about to bear a child when Zeus, awaiting the birth of his son Heracles, vowed that the first child born that day to a descendant of Perseus would reign over the Argives. Hera hastened Nicippe's birth pangs and she was delivered of Eurystheus, a seven-months child, hours before Heracles was born. This was why Heracles was a servant of Eurystheus, and why the latter succeeded his father as ruler of Mycenae.

Sthenias (sthen'i-as). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Strong." The Troezenians worshiped Athena Sthenias, and raised a temple to her on the citadel at Troezen.

Sthenius (sthen'i-us). Epithet of Zeus. The rock near Troezen under which Aegeus hid the tokens by which Theseus would be identified was known as the altar of Zeus Sthenius (Strong). When Theseus succeeded in moving it and recovering the tokens, the name was changed to the Rock of Theseus.

Stheno (sthē'nō, sthen'ō). A Gorgon, one of the daughters of Ceto and Phorcys. See Gorgons.

the Athenians in the Trojan War. He was a comrade of Menestheus, and was slain by Hector in the struggle at the Greek fortifications.

Stiria (stī-rī'a) or Stiritis (stī-rī'tis). Epithet of Demeter, from her sanctuary at Stiris in Phocis. The image in the sanctuary showed the goddess bound in ribbons.

Stoa (stō'a). A porticus or colonnade, a very important type of public building in ancient Greece and Italy. The term means "row of columns." In its simplest form the stoa was a long, narrow, one-story structure, its roof supported on the side facing the street, market-place, or temple enclosure by columns, on the other side by a blank wall, with ends open or closed. The plan was elaborated in various ways: with a second row of columns, with a second story, with projecting bays at each end, with two wings (forming an L), with three wings (forming three sides of a square or rectangle, the open side regularly toward the south to take the fullest advantage of winter sun and summer shade), with four wings, with a row of shops behind the columns, and so on. In the Athenian Agora one stoa has a wall on the longitudinal axis and columns on either long side, in effect, two stoas back-to-back. In Rome one porticus has no solid wall, the roof being supported solely by columns. At Delos the term stoa is applied to a large enclosed rectangular building, the Hypostyle Hall. Less sturdy in construction than temples, stoas were particularly vulnerable to earthquake, fire and the crowbars of vandals, and no stoa or porticus has survived intact; the Stoa of Attalus, at Athens, restored as the Agora Museum by the American excavators of the Agora, demonstrates better than any other the usefulness and adaptability of this popular and widespread building type. Stoas in Greece, and porticus in Rome, were places where lawyers and business men met their clients, magistrates conferred, teachers lectured, idlers lounged, and citizens generally took refuge from rain and sun. In the lexicon of philosophy, The Stoa refers to the Stoa Poikile or Painted Colonnade, bordering the Athenian Agora, where Zeno the Stoic and his successors lectured. (JJ)

Stoics (stō'iks). Disciples of the philosopher Zeno, who founded the sect c308 B.C. He taught that men should be free from passion, unmoved by joy or grief, and submit without complaint to the unavoidable necessity by which all things are governed. The Stoics are proverbially known for the sternness and austerity of their doctrines, and for the influence which their tenets exercised over some of the noblest spirits of antiquity, especially among the Romans. Their system appears to have been an attempt to reconcile a theological pantheism and a materialist psychology with a logic which seeks the foundations of knowledge in the representations or perceptions of the senses, and a morality which claims as its first principle the absolute freedom of the human will. The Stoics teach that whatever is real is material; that matter and force are the two ultimate principles; and that matter is of itself motionless and unformed, though capable of receiving all motions and all forms. Force is the active, moving, and molding principle, and is inseparably joined with matter; the working force in the universe is God, whose existence as a wise, thinking being is proved by the beauty and adaptation of the world. The supreme end of life, or the highest good, is virtue, that is, a life conformed to nature, the agreement of human conduct with the all-controlling law of nature, or of the human with the divine will; not contemplation, but action, is the supreme problem for man; virtue is sufficient for happiness, but happiness or pleasure should never be made the end of human endeavor. The wise man alone attains to the complete performance of his duty; he is without passion, although not without feeling; he is not indulgent but just toward himself and others; he alone is free; he is king and lord, and is inferior in inner worth to no other rational being. The sect takes its name from the Stoa Poikile, or Painted Colonnade, a building bordering the Agora of Athens, in which Zeno and his successors lectured.

Stolo (stō'lō), Caius Licinius Calvus. See Licinius (fl. 377-361 B.C.).

Stone People. In Greek mythology, the race of men that sprang up after the flood which only Deucalion and Pyrrha survived. To repopulate the earth, Deucalion and Pyrrha hurled the stones of earth, their mother, behind them. The stones thrown by Deucalion

Strabo (strā'bō), Cnaeus Pompeius. Roman statesman; killed by lightning, 87 B.C. He served Rome as quaestor in Sardinia (103 B.C.), praetor (94), propraetor in Sicily (93), and consul (89 B.C.). He took part in the Social War and was sponsor of the law that granted to the inhabitants of Transpadane Gaul the same privileges as were enjoyed by the Latin colonies. He was the father of Pompey the triumvir.

Strabo. Greek geographer, born at Amasia, Pontus, 63 B.C.; died c24 A.D. He was educated at Nysa and at Rome. On the conclusion of his education in philosophy he devoted himself to the study of history and geography. He traveled extensively, making visits to Asia Minor, Egypt, Greece, and Italy. His historical work was a history, in 47 books, the last 42 books of which were a continuation of Polybius to his own time. Only fragments of this work survive. His great Geographica, in 17 books, has survived almost intact, and has been the most important geographical work to come down to us from ancient times. It is written as scientific geography, after the system of Eratosthenes, and is an invaluable source for descriptions of countries and peoples, their customs and manners, and historical and geographical material. The first two books contain certain introductory material, including criticism of earlier geographers. Books III-X are devoted to Europe, XI-XVI to Asia, XVII to Egypt and North Africa.

Strato (strā'tō) or Straton (strā'ton). Greek peripatetic philosopher of Lampsacus, the successor of Theophrastus in the presidency of the Lyceum in 288 B.C.; died c268 B.C. He was called "the Naturalist" because he declared the intervention of a deity in nature unnecessary.

Stratonice (strat-ō-nī'sē). Daughter of Demetrius I of Macedonia, and wife of Seleucus I, and later of his son Antiochus I; fl. c300 B.C. Seleucus, discovering his son's passion for her, gave her to him, and at the same time made him king of the provinces of upper Asia.

Strongyle (stron'ji-lē). [Modern name, Stromboli.] Northernmost of the Aeoliae Insulae (Lipari islands), N of Sicily: famous for its constantly active volcano (elevation, about 3038 feet).

Strongyle. An ancient name of the island of Naxos.

Strophades (strof'a-dēz; Greek, strô-fā'thes). [Also: Stamphane, Stamphanes, Strofadhes; Italian, Strivali.] Group of small islands W of the Peloponnesus, Greece. Hither the sons of Boreas were said, in Greek legend, to have pursued the Harpies, and here they turned back from their pursuit. The Harpies remained on the islands, which took the name, meaning the islands of turning, from the fact that the Boreadae, Calais and Zetes, turned back here. Later, Aeneas stopped here and the Harpies harried his exhausted men, and predicted that the Trojans would one day be so hungry they would be compelled to eat their tables. They also prophesied a long and difficult journey for Aeneas and his men.

Strophius (strō'fi-us). In Greek legend, a king in Phocis. His realm was at the foot of Mount Parnassus. He married a sister of Agamemnon, who bore him a son Pylades. Orestes was sent to him after the murder of Agamemnon for protection from the wicked designs of Aegisthus, and was brought up in his court. Strophius disowned his son, Pylades, the faithful friend of Orestes, for his part in Orestes' murder of Clytemnestra.

Strymon (strī'mon). [Modern name, Struma.] A river of Thrace which empties into the Aegean Sea. It was reputed to be the nesting ground of the cranes which fought the Pygmies. The river-god, according to some accounts, ravished the muse Calliope, or Euterpe, and fathered Rhesus, the Thracian king who went to the aid of Hector and was killed by Diomedes and Odysseus.

Strymonic Gulf (strī-mon'ik). [Also: Gulf of Orfani; Latin, Strymonicus Sinus.] Arm of the Aegean Sea, indenting the coast of Macedonia, Greece, E of the peninsula of Chalcidice, at the mouth of the Strymon River.

Stylobate (stī'lō-bāt). In architecture, a continuous basement upon which columns are placed to raise them above the level of the ground or a floor; particularly, the uppermost step of the stereobate of a columnar building, upon which rests an entire range of columns. It is distinguished from a pedestal, which, when it occurs in this use, supports only a single column.

Stymphalides/Suessa Aurunca

Stymphalides (stim-fā'li-dēz). In Greek legend, a flock of fierce man-eating birds near Lake Stymphalus. They had bronze claws, beaks, and wings, and could discharge their own feathers like arrows. To kill them was the sixth labor of Heracles.

Stymphalus (stim-fā'lus). In Greek legend, a son of Elatus and Laodice, daughter of Cinyras. He was a king in Arcadia. When Pelops came into the Peloponnesus he waged war on Stymphalus, but could not defeat him by force of arms. He invited Stymphalus to meet with him for discussion under truce, and when Stymphalus came to his camp, he murdered him, dismembered his body, and cast his limbs to the four winds. This treacherous murder by Pelops brought a terrible drought on all Greece, which was lifted only when, on the advice of the oracle at Delphi, Aeacus prayed to Zeus for relief. Stymphalus in Arcadia is named for him.

Stymphalus. In ancient geography, a district and lake in the NE part of Arcadia, Greece. According to tradition, it was named for Stymphalus, the grandson of Arcas. In the ancient city, which was later moved to a new site, lived Temenus, son of Pelasgus. Temenus, some say, reared Hera and founded three sanctuaries for her. About the spring and lake of Stymphalus dwelt the savage, man-eating Stymphalian birds that were shot down as one of the Labors of Heracles. The birds were carved on the sanctuary of Stymphalian Artemis, and behind the sanctuary stood figures of maidens, in white marble, with the legs of birds. The Stymphalus River, the source of which is a spring, disappears, says Pausanias, into the earth through a chasm, and reappears in Argolis as the Erasinus River. Once, when the festival of Stymphalian Artemis was carelessly observed, a log of wood fell into the chasm and blocked it up. The river backed up and flooded the plain. Shortly thereafter, a hunter pursuing a deer followed it as it fled into the marshy plain. The chasm opened and swallowed up deer and hunter, and the river followed them into the chasm and dried up the plain. After this warning the inhabitants of Stymphalus celebrated the festival of Stymphalian Artemis with due care. The people of Stymphalus joined with the Argives of their own accord but they were, in fact, as Homer says, Arcadians.

Styx (stiks). In Greek mythology, a nymph, the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. Because she was the first of the deities to go to the aid of Zeus when the Titans attacked him, Zeus took her children, among them Nike, to Olympus. He also made her the goddess by whom the most inviolable oaths were sworn. Styx dwelt on the western shore of the river Styx, near the edge of night, in a house with silver pillars. She guarded the Aloidæ, who were tied to pillars with living serpents as a punishment for having attacked Olympus. Some say Styx was the mother of Persephone by Zeus.

Styx. In Greek mythology, one of the five rivers surrounding Hades, over which the ghosts of the dead who have been properly buried must pass. The river is so sacred that the gods swear by it. When one of the gods takes an oath by the Styx, Iris brings water from the river in a golden cup. Punishment for breaking an oath taken by the Styx consists in banishment from the councils of the gods for nine years. In ancient geography Styx was also the name of a river that flowed by the city of Nonacris in Arcadia. The water trickles down from a high cliff and flows into the Crathis River, or, as some say, it flows to Tartarus. The waters of the Styx were believed to bring death to all who drank them. Among the wonderful properties of the water it was claimed that it broke all things of glass, crystal, stone, and pottery, and corroded all metals. The only material that could withstand it was a horse's hoof. The Arcadians swore their most binding oaths by their river Styx. Hither the daughters of Proetus fled when they were struck by madness, and near here Melampus overtook them and cured them.

Subura (sö-bū'ra). Valley in ancient Rome, on the N side of the Fora, and extending between the Viminal and Esquiline hills. It was drained by the Cloaca Maxima.

Suessa Aurunca (swes'a a-rung'ka). A town on the SW slopes of the extinct volcano now known as Roccamonfina, commanding the pass between Roccamonfina and the Mons Massicus of wine-growing fame. On this site was established in 313 B.C. the Latin

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

colony of Suessa Aurunca, which survives today as Sessa or Sessa Aurunca. It was the birthplace of the Latin satirist Caius Lucilius. To the imperial period belong an amphitheater and numerous architectural fragments from temples and other buildings, while in the neighborhood is a celebrated Roman bridge, the Ponte Ronaco (= Aurunco), still in daily use. It has been suggested that Suessa preserves an alternate pronunciation or dialectal form of Vescia, a lost city of the Ausones, and if so Suessa may stand over or near the site of ancient Vescia; but no traces of a pre-Roman Suessa have been identified. If, as a single late reference indicates, Roccamonfina last erupted in 269 B.C., Vescia may have been buried by ash, like Pompeii, and may still be awaiting the discoverer's spade. (JJ)

Suessiones (swes-i-ō'nēz). Ancient people of Gallia Belgica, allied to and situated near the Remi, in the vicinity of what is now Soissons, which was named after them. They were subjugated (57 B.C.) by Julius Caesar.

Suessula (swes'ū-lā). In ancient geography, a place in Campania, Italy, about 13 miles NE of Naples. It is the traditional scene of a Roman victory over the Samnites in the First Samnite War (343-341 B.C.).

Suetonius (swē-tō'ni-us). [Full name, Caius Suetonius Tranquillus.] Roman biographer and historian; fl. in the first part of the 2nd century A.D. He was a teacher of rhetoric in Rome, and a great friend of the younger Pliny who was influential in securing many favors for him and with whom he traveled to Bithynia in 112. He was private secretary to Hadrian (c119-121) and then devoted himself to his literary pursuits. He collected information and notes on all sorts of matters and wrote about them. His chief work is Lives of the Caesars, which contains biographies (of an anecdotal character) of the first 12 Caesars, including Julius. The work is important for its revelations concerning the private life of the emperors. Fragments of his De grammaticis and of other works are extant.

Suevi (swē'vī). Ancient Germanic people mentioned by Caesar, who describes them as the largest and most warlike of the German tribes. At the time of Tacitus the name Suevi had become a generic term for all the Germans to the north and east. They occupied all C Germany W of the Oder River, from the boundaries of the Harudes, who alone intervened between them and the Baltic, to the Danube River. In the first half of the 5th century A.D. the Suevi appeared as neighbors and allies of the Alamanni, with whom they acted as one folk. Either name has been used for the whole people, but they were probably two closely related groups. Together they were crushingly defeated by the Franks under Clovis. Subsequently the Suevi were settled about the headwaters of the Danube River, where their name was preserved in Swabia (Schwaben).

Suiones (sō-yō'nēz). [Also: Suyones.] Ancient Germanic people of Scandinavia, mentioned by Tacitus in Germania as living on the Baltic and having readily maneuverable ships with a prow at each end. They appear later to have occupied what is now the S part of Sweden.

Sulla (sul'a), Lucius Cornelius. [Surnamed Felix.] Roman general and dictator; born c138 B.C.; died 78 B.C. He was the son of an obscure and impoverished patrician family, and as a young man was compelled to live in lodgings for lack of his own estate. This fact was remembered by his enemies when he subsequently became wealthy in the service of the state. Towards the end of his life he took the surname Felix (Fortunate) in grateful acknowledgment to the gods, who always smiled on his undertakings as will presently appear. According to Plutarch, he loved a wealthy woman of plebeian birth and so charmed her that when she presently died she left him all her fortune. His stepmother also left him her property. He thus arrived at a fairly comfortable financial state and prepared to enter public life. In 107 B.C. he was appointed as quaestor to the consul Marius, and went to Libya to serve in the war against Jugurtha (107-106 B.C.). Sulla made friends with the Numidian king, Bocchus, who was also the father-in-law of Jugurtha. Bocchus plotted with Sulla to surrender Jugurtha to him. At some risk to himself Sulla put himself in Bocchus' power for the purpose of executing the plot. Bocchus secured the presence of Jugurtha by trickery and, though he wavered as to whether it would be more to his advantage to seize Sulla, decided Jugurtha was more of a danger to him and surrendered him to Sulla and ended the war. Marius, as consul, was honored with a triumph for the war, but Sulla was publicly credited with the seizure of Jugurtha. For his pride's sake he had a seal ring made, on which was engraved a figure of Bocchus surrendering Jugurtha to him. The prominence Sulla won in the Numidian war was not pleasing to Marius. Nevertheless, he concealed his jealousy and used Sulla to good advantage in subsequent campaigns. Sulla served under him during his second and third consulships (104 and 103 B.C.), and won the friendship of the Marsi for Rome. Becoming aware that Marius was acting to halt his advancement, he attached himself to Catulus, co-consul with Marius. Catulus, less ambitious or more indolent than Marius, gave Sulla free rein. He subdued the Cimbri and Teutones (104-101 B.C.) in the Alps and returned to Rome. In 93 B.C. he became praetor as the result of lavish expenditures, and in 92 B.C. as propraetor of Cilicia he defeated the general of Mithridates VI and restored Ariobarzanes to the throne of Cappadocia. In this war, carried on with the help of Roman allies, he slew many Cappadocians and Armenians, and received an envoy of the Parthian king Arsaces, who asked for friendship and alliance with Rome. He then returned to Rome, where the breach with Marius became open rivalry when Bocchus dedicated some images at Rome that portrayed Sulla accepting the surrender of Jugurtha. The rivalry between Marius and Sulla to control Rome was submerged by the outbreak of the Social War, 90 B.C. The war was so-called because it was a war between Rome and her Italian allies (socii meaning allies). Sulla achieved great fame by his exploits in the war, which included the defeat of the Samnites and the capture of Bovianum (89 B.C.). In 88 B.C. he became consul with Pompey. He brought the Social War to an end by the capture of Nola, and then by lot was chosen commander of the war against Mithridates, which had been renewed by the latter in attacking Rome's allies. Marius wanted the command of this war and his attempts to get it brought on civil war in Rome. Many omens are said to have foretold the civil conflict. Mice gnawed at the sacred gold in the temple; keepers caught one of them in a trap. It produced five young and immediately ate three of them. A trumpet rang out in a shrill and dismal tone and amazed and terrified the people. Seers said this foretold a change in conditions at Rome and a new age of man. While the Senate sat to consider these prodigies a sparrow flew into their chamber with a grasshopper in its mouth. The bird threw part of the insect on the Senate floor and flew off with the rest of its body. Seers interpreted this gloomily as a sign of trouble among the Romans. Marius allied himself to Sulpicius Rufus, an unscrupulous and dangerous popular leader who was tribune of the plebs. He proposed that Marius be made general in command of the Mithridatic War, and when the Senate refused to act he roused a mob against them. In the mêlée Pompey's son was killed. Sulla fled to the house of Marius, who might have killed him, but allowed him to escape. He fled to his army at Nola. In the meantime Sulpicius had deposed Pompey as consul and secured command of the Mithridatic War for Marius. But when the tribunes arrived at Nola to take over the army for Marius they were stoned by Sulla's troops, whose loyalty he had won by his flattery, his military successes, and the plunder he helped them to secure. When Marius learned of his defiance of the tribunes he attacked Sulla's partisans in Rome, slew many of them, and seized their property. Thus the civil war began.

It is said that a vision came to Sulla at this time. He dreamed a goddess stood beside him and gave him a thunderbolt. She named his enemies and invited him to strike them with the thunderbolt. He did so and they at once vanished. Encouraged by this omen, he marched on Rome; the first Roman ever to lead a Roman army against Rome. When he entered the gates of the city some of the people showered his army with rocks and tiles hurled from the roof tops. He ordered the houses fired, friend and foe alike. Marius could not stop him from entering the city. He fled to a temple for refuge, and then left the city. Sulla was now master.

He called the Senate together and had Marius and Sulpicius condemned to death in absentia. He had won a political and military but not a popular victory. The people distrusted him as an arrogant aristocrat and feared him because he had shown his scorn of their tribunes. Nevertheless, he was the master. In 87 B.C. he set out to command the war against Mithridates. He went to Athens, which sided with Mithridates and was the center of his activity in the west, and laid siege to the city. When he needed timber for his siege engines he ruthlessly cut down the sacred groves of the Academy and the Lyceum. When he needed money for his operations he sent to Epidaurus, Olympia, and Delphi and removed the treasures from their temples. At Delphi the priests thought to frighten away his envoys by causing a musician to play the flute in an inner chamber and informing them that the music came from the god, who forbade them to harm his shrine. The envoys were fearful and relayed the message to Sulla. He sent back word that the music had been misinterpreted: the god was playing to welcome a friend; the envoys were ordered to proceed with the pillaging of the shrine. Among the treasures taken from Delphi was the great silver bowl dedicated there by the Lydian king Croesus. Sulla promised that he would replace the treasures necessity compelled him to seize from the temples. He took Athens (86 B.C.) by treachery, marched into the city at night and gave it over to his men to plunder. The streets ran with blood. But thanks to the pleas of some Roman senators in his train he did not destroy the city. He went on to take the Piraeus and burned it. From here he took his forces into Boeotia, met the forces of Mithridates' general Archelaus at Chaeronea and defeated them (86 B.C.). In the following year reinforcements came to Archelaus. An enemy charge inflicted damage on Sulla's troops and they fell back. As they retreated Sulla jumped from his horse and pushed toward the enemy on foot, crying, "For me, O Romans, an honorable death here; but you, when men ask you where you betrayed your commander, remember to tell them, at Orchomenus." His men rallied and next day defeated Archelaus at Orchomenus (85 B.C.). In 84 B.C. he went into Asia and defeated Fimbria, a Marian leader who sought to take his command, and compelled Mithridates to come to terms with him. Mithridates and Sulla met at Dardanus in the Troad. Mithridates agreed to give up Asia (Asia Minor) and Paphlagonia; to restore the kings of Bithynia and Cappadocia, whose thrones he had seized; to pay an indemnity to Rome; and to contribute 70 ships to the Roman fleet. Sulla for his part guaranteed Mithridates in the territory that was left him and made him an ally of Rome.

In the meantime, terrible news had reached him from Rome. Marius had returned (87 B.C.) and captured the control of the city. Sulla's wife had come to him in Athens and told him of the destruction of his property in Rome and of the wholesale slaughter of his friends. Having concluded peace with Mithridates he now prepared to return to Rome. His soldiers, who had taken enormous booty while in his service, voluntarily swore allegiance to him. He sailed across to Italy (83 B.C.) and landed at Brundisium. By this time Marius had died (86 B.C.) and the opposition to Sulla was led by Cinna, Carbo, and the Younger Marius. Sulla defeated the forces sent against him by Marius the Younger and the consul Norbanus, then defeated Marius at Signia, near Praeneste. Marius escaped to Praeneste, but arrived after the gate had been closed. He was hauled up over the walls by a rope to safety. Sulla's generals, Pompey, Crassus, Metellus, and Servilius, were equally victorious in their areas. At last Carbo, the remaining leader of the opposition, fled to Libya (82 B.C.). The Samnites had taken advantage of the civil war to march on Rome. Sulla defeated them at the Colline Gate (82 B.C.) and was again master of Rome. He issued a sweeping proscription against his enemies. By the proscription any one who wished could kill with impunity anyone whose name appeared on the proscribed list. Many on the list were Sulla's enemies. Others were the owners of fine properties Sulla wished to take, for himself or for his friends. The sons and grandsons of those who were proscribed lost their civil rights. This was the first time in Roman history, but not the last, that a reign of terror was inaugurated by means of a proscription. Marius the Younger committed suicide. Sulla caused to be slain all those in the city of Praeneste who had helped Marius—to the number of 12,000.

Sulmo/Sulpicius Rufus, Publius

Sulla now made himself dictator, thus reviving an office that had lapsed 120 years earlier, celebrated a magnificent triumph for the Mithridatic War, and took the surname Felix (Fortunate) to acknowledge his debt to the gods. In 80 B.C. he became consul. His activities had resulted in the crushing of all opposition and the expropriation of the property of Marius' followers to the advantage of Sulla's. As master of Rome he made various constitutional reforms. He reorganized and restored the power of the Senate and weakened the power of the tribunes. He established a system of courts of justice. To support the political system he established military colonies on large grants of land throughout Italy. One of Sulla's enemies was Julius Caesar. He pursued the latter to such an extent that he was forced to change his lodging nightly. Finally, Sulla yielded to the pleas of the aristocratic party (optimates) to forgive Caesar. As he did so he warned those who pleaded in Caesar's behalf that the man they pleaded for would one day destroy their party. In this he was an excellent prophet. The personal life of Sulla was as vigorous and ruthless as his military life. In his hours of relaxation he enjoyed the company of actors and jesters, drank deep, and gave himself to every form of voluptuousness. He could show the most benign patience with his friends, or the most brutal anger. Of himself he said he never failed to reward his friends' kindnesses or to punish his enemies' wrongs, and this was inscribed on his monument. However, frequently the kindnesses of friends were transformed in his eyes into the wrongs of enemies. He was married at least four times. One of his wives was Caecilia, daughter of the pontifex maximus Metellus. He married her when he was 50 years old, having put aside previous wives, and always showed her the greatest deference. Yet when at last she was dying he divorced her and had her removed to another place so as not to pollute his house with her death. This however, was in accordance with the custom, and did not at all hinder him from giving her a magnificent funeral. He resigned the dictatorship in 79 B.C. and retired to Puteoli, where he amused himself with his actor friends and finished his Memoirs. He died quietly in 78 B.C., was given a splendid public funeral, and was buried in the Campus Martius.

Sulmo (sul'mō). [Modern names; Sulmona, Solmona.] Town of C Italy. It was a Roman town, in the region of the Sabines, from ancient times. The town was taken and sacked by Hannibal, 211 B.C. It is the birthplace of the poet Ovid, its most famous son.

Sulpicia (sul-pish'a). Roman poetess of the Augustan age, daughter of Servius Sulpicius Rufus. Six charming short elegies by her, in which she speaks of her love for Cerinthus, have survived in the collected works of the elegist Tibullus (Book IV, nos. 7-12). (JJ)

Sulpicius Galba (sul-pish'us gal'ba), Servius. See Galba, Servius Sulpicius.

Sulpicius Rufus (rō'fus), Publius. Roman politician and orator; born c121 B.C.; killed 88 B.C. Prior to his tribunate in 88 B.C. he had been a member of the aristocratic party (optimates) but upon becoming a tribune of the plebs he switched his allegiance to the popular party (populares). It is said that he had a personal bodyguard of 3000 young men who kept Rome in a turmoil and Sulpicius powerful, and that he bought popularity by selling the Roman citizenship for a price. He was a partisan of Marius, the leader of the popular party, and proposed that he be made general in command of the war against Mithridates (88 B.C.). The consuls, Sulla and Pompey, refused to let the matter come to a vote. Sulpicius used his bodyguard to stir up a riot against them. Both fled. Sulpicius deposed Pompey from his consulship and took the command of the Mithridatic War away from Sulla, who had won it by lot, and gave it to Marius. However, the tribunes who went to Nola to take over Sulla's army were stoned by his loyal troops. Sulla led them against Rome, made himself master of the city, and condemned Sulpicius and Marius, who had fled, to death in absentia. Sulpicius was killed by a slave Sulla had freed for the express purpose of killing him. Afterward, Sulla caused the slave to be hurled to his death from the Tarpeian Rock.

Summanus (su-mā'nus). In Roman mythology, a god of thunderstorms, specifically the sender of thunderstorms at night. Summanus may originally have been an epithet of Jupiter as "Dweller in the most high places"; but the separate identity of this god as a nocturnal thunder deity has now been long accepted.

Sunium (sō'ni-um) or Sunium Promontorium (prom-on-tō'ri-um). [Also: Sounion, Cape Colonna.] In ancient geography, a lofty headland running into the sea at the SE extremity of Attica. At the summit, enclosed by a fortification wall and approached through propylaea or formal entrance gates, are the striking ruins of a splendid Periclean Doric hexastyle temple of the sea-god Poseidon, designed by the Theseum Architect, constructed c444 B.C. to replace an earlier temple, and conspicuous far out to sea. It is built of a local marble which unlike Pentelic marble has not weathered to a russet patina, but retains its dazzling whiteness. The view of the Aegean and its islands from the temple terrace is superb. Outside the sanctuary, at a little distance, are the foundations of an Ionic temple of Athena, unusual in that it had exterior columns on the front (E) and one flank (S) only. According to Homer, Phrontis, pilot of Menelaus, was struck down by the arrows of Apollo as his ship rounded Sunium on the return from Troy. (JJ)

Superi (sū'pē-rī). A Roman name for the gods. It was sometimes used also of mortals, to distinguish them from the Inferi: that is, the dead in the Underworld.

Suppliant Maidens, The. A drama by Aeschylus, of uncertain date. It is concerned with the Danaids, daughters of Danaus and descendants of Zeus and Io, and their flight from hated marriage with their cousins, the sons of Aegyptus. They have fled over the sea from Egypt to Argos, where they appeal to Pelasgus, king of Argos, for asylum. The scene is a sacred precinct with images of the gods, on the shore near Argos.

A chorus of maidens, daughters of Danaus, enters the sacred precinct. In a choral song that rises in dramatic intensity the maidens tell why they have come to Argos, which they regard as their ancestral home, as it was the home of Io, the mother of their race. They pray the land to receive them, and to repel the hated, pursuing sons of Aegyptus, marriage with whom would, they insist, be impious. They appeal to the justice of the gods to uphold them in their cause, and especially invoke Zeus the all-powerful to protect them. It is Hera's hatred of Io, they say, that has caused their troubles. Zeus would risk the charge of injustice, they contend, if he denied their prayers.

Danaus enters. He advises his daughters to be prudent, and to accept his counsel, which is that they cast themselves before the altars as suppliants; for an altar, he tells them, is stronger than a castle. He observes men approaching the precinct. His daughters must explain their plight and ask asylum. Moreover, they must make their plea with due modesty, as they are aliens, fugitives, and in need. Pelasgus enters. From their garments he observes that they are not Greeks. He asks who they are. Before replying, the maidens would like to know who he is. They learn that he is the king of a large and prosperous realm—Argos. For their part, the chorus asks him a series of questions about Zeus, Io, and Hera. By his answers: that Io of Argos was transformed into a heifer by Zeus, wandered through many lands before she arrived at the Nile and at the "touch" of Zeus bore Epaphus, Pelasgus himself relates their ancestry, for they are descendants of Epaphus. It is thus made clear that they are connected with Argos and have a claim on that land. He now learns that they are the daughters of Danaus, and that they have fled to the land of their ancient origin to escape marriage with the sons of Aegyptus. Pelasgus, hearing their pleas, is caught: if he refuses sanctuary to the maidens he offends the gods; if he grants sanctuary he risks war with the sons of Aegyptus. He proposes to submit the question to his citizens. The maidens contend that it is his responsibility alone. He tries a reasonable approach. It is a good thing, he suggests, for cousins to marry, as it strengthens the family. They brush this aside. Perhaps the laws of the land sanction such marriages, he asks. The maidens cry for Justice. It is not an easy question for Pelasgus to decide and he refuses to decide it. He will consult with his people; thus if the event turns out unfortunately they will not be able to throw the blame on him. Now the maidens, with savage determination, threaten to hang themselves by their own girdles before the sacred images if he refuses their plea for asylum. Pelasgus repeats that the two courses open to him are equally fraught with danger: the unknown terrors which would result from offending the gods, or the known and dreaded evils of war with the sons of Aegyptus. He sends Danaus to lay the boughs of suppliants at other altars throughout Argos and so arouse the compassion of his people for the Danaids. Pelasgus also departs to persuade his people to vote to protect the suppliants, regardless of the ills such a course may bring to the state. Left alone, the maidens pray to Zeus. They relate the story of Io and ask Zeus to protect them, Io's descendants, as it is within his power to do, and express their trust in him. Danaus returns and informs them that the Argives, by an overwhelming vote, have decided to give them sanctuary. Pelasgus made a persuasive speech but Zeus brought about the favorable result. The maidens respond with a fervent hymn of gratitude. They pray for rich blessings on the people of Argos. Danaus now announces that he sees an Egyptian fleet approaching. He urges his daughters to be calm and departs to give the alarm. The maidens, recalling the lewdness and savagery of the Egyptians, resolve to die rather than submit. A herald from the sons of Aegyptus enters and roughly orders them to the ships. His command is followed by threats. He has no use for these gods before whom the maidens pray; they are not his gods. As the maidens continue to defy him he attempts to lay hands on them and compel them. At this point Pelasgus enters. He accuses the herald of barbarism and declares that he will protect the maidens. To the herald's demand to know who he is Pelasgus replies it is not important: if the maidens decide to go of their own free will the herald may conduct them, but the people have voted never to surrender them against their will. The herald blusters and threatens war, but leaves.

Pelasgus again assures the maidens and goes to make ready for war. Danaus returns. He commands his daughters to offer sacrifices to the gods for their saviors, the Pelasgians (Argives), and tells them to protect their chastity, for which they have made such a long flight. The chorus of Danaids and a group of their attendant maidens, who have hitherto been silent, alternate in singing the praises of Argos. The Danaids repeat their vows to Artemis to remain virgins, thus denying the power of Aphrodite, and declare that under no circumstances will they marry any of the race of Aegyptus. Their handmaidens advise them to moderate their prayer, as it is not good to ask too much of heaven. The balance of Zeus requires both Artemis and Aphrodite, but the Danaids are obstinately determined to follow Artemis in this matter. Suppliant Women, The. Tragedy by Euripides, produced c420 B.C. Following the disastrous defeat of the Seven against Thebes, of whom only Adrastus survived, the Argives sent to Thebes and asked permission to recover the bodies of their dead for burial. The Thebans defied all the laws of warfare and religion by denying their request. (The play on this subject was produced during the Peloponnesian Wars between Athens and Sparta, and contains many Euripidean warnings against the folly of war, as well as eulogizing Athens as a humane nation that upholds the sanctity of law.)

The scene is in a court of the temple of Demeter at Eleusis. Aethra, mother of Theseus, is seated on the steps of the great altar in the middle of the court. About her are the mothers of the slain Argive chiefs and their handmaids, and nearby Adrastus is lying prostrate. Aethra is attached to the Argive women by woolen fillets that stretch to them and to her from the olive boughs the suppliants have placed on the altar. No one but the ruler can remove these fillets without committing sacrilege. Aethra prays for prosperity for Athens as she recounts the sad lot of these mothers. The women implore her, as one still blessed with a son, to help them recover their dead, for without proper burial their sons will be homeless and accursed in Hades (want of proper burial was deemed a worse calamity than death itself by the Greeks). Theseus, summoned by a herald,

enters, and is troubled to see mourners in the temple, for this is an evil omen. He learns from Aethra who they are and why they have come, and addresses himself to Adrastus. Adrastus relates how he gave his daughters to two aliens, Tydeus and Polynices, at the command of an oracle, and waged war on Thebes to reclaim the inheritance of his son-in-law Polynices. In making war he admits that he flouted other oracles. Worse still, he refused to accept a compromise offered by Eteocles that would have prevented the war, and in self-blame he exclaims,

end Feuds, yet decide them in the field of blood!"

Now he humbly kneels to young Theseus and begs him to "save my dead." He appeals as a poor man to a rich one, and has come to Athens rather than to another state because the Spartans are heartless and the other states are neither strong enough nor compassionate enough to help him. Theseus chides him for greediness in attacking Thebes, and for foolishness in flouting the will of the gods. If he were to yield to the wishes of Adrastus he could not defend himself to his Athenians. He therefore bids Adrastus depart and not seek to pull down Athens in his own downfall. Adrastus replies that he has already been punished for his folly and his crimes. He wants help, not judgment, from Theseus; since Theseus denies him, he and his suppliants will withdraw. Aethra breaks in; she weeps for the Argive women. Theseus is surprised; their woes are no concern to her since they are not of her blood. But she insists she must speak for his and Athens' honor; he must not err by denying their appeal as suppliants. He is bound to champion the oppressed, for on that rests his fame. Moreover, he must honor the law of burial. His former brave deeds will be as nothing if in this case he refuses to take up the sword in behalf of the suppliants. Theseus is swayed by her words. He agrees to help the Argives, but first he will gain the approval of the Athenians for his undertaking. As he leaves the chorus praises Athens.

Theseus shortly returns with a herald, whom he instructs to go to Creon of Thebes and ask, as a neighbor and as a right, the return of the slain. If Creon refuses, the herald is instructed to tell him that Athens will fight to uphold the laws of burial. Before he has finished his instructions a Theban herald enters and demands the despot of the city. Theseus corrects him; there is no despot in Athens: its people are free. The herald expresses his scorn for a city that is ruled by an unreasoning mob, and lists all the disadvantages of a democracy. Theseus retorts by citing the advantages of a democracy—where the law is written down, known to all, and applied to all, and the disadvantages of tyranny—where the tyrant kills off possible rivals, seizes the produce of the worker, and ravishes the maidens. Recollecting himself, he tells the herald to get on with his message, and suggests that in future Creon send a less talkative herald. The message is a command to Athens to refuse to receive Adrastus, or if he is already there, to drive him out; it reminds Athens that she has nothing to do with the Argives, advises the Athenians to savor the joys of peace and avoid matters which are of no concern to them. To be discreet, the herald adds, is also to be brave, for ". . . were death in view when votes are cast, Never war-frenzied Greece would rush on ruin." Adrastus and the chorus break in, but Theseus stops them; the message is addressed to him and he will reply. Creon is not master of Athens, he tells the herald, and in seeking to recover the bodies for burial Athens is simply upholding the most sacred laws. This is a common cause of all Greece, not only of Argos;

Never to Greeks shall it be said, that when
It fell to me and Athens to uphold

Heaven's ancient law, that law was set at naught.

If war results it will be a war forced by Creon, not by Athens. The Theban herald warns that meddling Athens will never prevail and departs. Theseus goes to call his men to arms. He declines the company of Adrastus in his army, lest the pollution of which Adrastus was guilty in his war become associated with and sully the noble purpose of Theseus in his war. The Argive women, left alone, fear that new reproaches will be heaped on them if the Athenians lose in the war. They tremble at the unpredictability of the gods, and pray to Zeus to champion the Athenians. A messenger now enters and informs them that Theseus, in full scale battle, has defeated Creon, but he refused to sack Thebes, for he had fought only for a pure purpose and not for gain or vengeance. He is bringing back the slain Argive chiefs, but the other dead he prepared for burial himself and entombed them. The Argive women rejoice that their sons will now be buried but mourn anew their deaths. They wish they had never married, rather than look upon their sons' corpses. Theseus enters with a procession carrying the biers of the Argives. He respects the mourning of the Argives, then asks that the gallant deeds of the slain chiefs be recounted for his young Athenians. Adrastus points out and characterizes each of the heroes—Capaneus, "true friend;" Eteoclus, "rich with honor;" Hippomedon "eager to yield his land his body's best;" Parthenopaeus, "unmatched in purity;" Tydeus, "dread reasoner in the logic of the shield." Capaneus, felled by a thunderbolt of Zeus, is to be buried separately (to the Greeks one struck by lightning became sacred), funeral pyres are erected for the others. Adrastus cries out to the mothers to look upon their dead sons, and is rebuked by Theseus for adding to their anguish. Adrastus admits his fault, for:

Short is life's span: behoves to pass through this

Softly as may be, not with travail worn. The procession moves off, as the chorus mourns. Suddenly Evadne, wife of Capaneus, is seen mounting the cliff above his pyre. She cries out that she will end her life in the same fire that destroys her beloved husband's body. Her father Iphis, come to search for her, is just in time to see her leap into the flames. He is heartbroken. He has lost his son Eteoclus, and now sees his daughter die. If he had known what suffering comes from having children he would never have had any. He laments that man cannot live twice in one life, to profit by what he learns. Broken and alone, he wanders off to die. A procession enters bearing urns with the ashes of the dead chiefs. The chorus of mothers and children of the dead mourn; the sons of the slain chiefs pray that they may grow up to avenge their fathers. Theseus admonishes the Argives to honor Athens for recovering their dead. Athena appears in her chariot above the temple and instructs Theseus to extract an oath of eternal friendship from Argos in return for the ashes of the dead Argives he has given them. (The goddess is less generous than the mortal Theseus.) She then addresses the sons of the Argive chiefs and predicts that they will avenge their fathers. Theseus promises to obey her will, and prays for her continued guidance so that Athens may prosper.

Surrentum (su-ren'tum). [Modern name, Sorrento.] Town in S Italy, situated on cliffs high above the Bay of Naples, about 16 miles SE of Naples. It has been famous since ancient times for its location and its wine, and has always been a popular resort. In ancient times its most celebrated temples were those of Athena and of the Sirens. It has numerous Roman remains, including villas and temples.

Susa (sö'zä, sö'sä). [Biblical name, Shushan.] In ancient geography, the capital of Susiana or Elam, "the City of Lilies," situated near the Choaspes (Karkheh) River, S of modern Dizful in Iran. It was destroyed in 645 B.C. by Assurbanipal. The Achaemenid kings of Persia made it their winter residence, and provided it with a citadel. It was still flourishing in the 12th century A.D. It is frequently mentioned in the books of Daniel and Esther. The site at present exhibits a group of high and large mounds, forming together a diamond-shaped figure about 3½ miles in circuit. Excavations were made in 1851 by Loftus in one of the mounds, disclosing the palace of Artaxerxes II, the chief feature being a fine colonnade of 340 feet front. The excavations of M. A. Dieulafoy, between 1884 and 1886, laid bare beneath these ruins those of the palace of Darius the Great, and showed that the upper strata of the mound are formed by superposed layers of ruins.

Susiana (sö-zi-ä'nä, -an'ä). Province of the Persian Empire, corresponding to the Biblical Elam and to the region of modern Iran known as Khuzistan. It was an independent state after the first destruction of Nineveh, and was subdued by Sargon II. Its capital was Susa.

Swan. One of the birds sacred to Aphrodite. Sybaris (sib'ä-ris). In ancient geography, a city of Magna Graecia, S Italy, situated near the Gulf of Tarentum. It was founded (720 B.C.) by Achaean and Troezenian colonists. It was celebrated for its wealth, and its inhabitants were proverbial for their luxury (whence the epithet "Sybarite"). It was destroyed (510 B.C.) by the Pythagorean inhabitants of Croton. A second Sybaris rose upon the ruins of the first, but it never flourished, and was finally absorbed in the Athenian colony of Thurii (443 B.C.). Herodotus is said to have been one of the colonists. The site has been covered so deeply by earth eroded from the nearby hills that no sign of occupation appeared above ground, and archaeologists had searched in vain for its precise location, until in 1953 Donald F. Brown explored the plain with a coring tool and brought up specimens of datable pottery which established its position and approximate limits beyond reasonable doubt. The modern village near the site is Terranova di Sibari. (JJ)

Sybota (sib'ō-tā). In ancient geography, a small town on the coast of Epirus, Greece, opposite the S end of Corcyra (Corfu). Near it was fought (432 B.C.) a naval battle between Corcyra (aided by Athens) and Corinth. The Corinthians won the sea fight, but withdrew the next day.

Sychaeus (si-kē'us). In Roman legend, a priest of Hercules in Tyre. He was Dido's husband, and was murdered by her brother Pygmalion for his wealth. After the murder he appeared to Dido in a dream and informed her of her brother's treachery. He warned her to flee the country and told her where his treasure was hidden so that she could take it with her. He was reunited with Dido in the Underworld. Sychaeus was sometimes also known as Acerbas.

Syennesis (si-en'e-sis). Name common to all the kings of Cilicia mentioned in history, especially that of a vassal of Persia, at the time of the expedition of Cyrus the Younger (401 B.C.).

Syleus (sil'ē-us, -ūs). According to some accounts, a king in Aulis, but others say he lived in Lydia. He compelled passing strangers to work in his vineyard. Heracles, when he was in the service of Omphale, ravaged his vineyard and killed Syleus.

Syloson (sil'ō-sōn). A son of Aeaces, and the brother of Polycrates of Samos. Polycrates seized the power in Samos and sent Syloson into exile. He went to Memphis in Egypt. It was while he was there that Cambyses made his successful expedition against Egypt and came to Memphis. According to Herodotus, one day Syloson, wearing a scarlet cloak, happened to go to the market-place. Darius, at that time a mere member of Cambyses' body-guard and with no particular prospects, chanced to see Syloson, admired his cloak, and asked if Syloson would sell it to him. Syloson, on impulse, said there was no price he would take for his cloak, but that he would freely give it to Darius and did so. After Darius had gained the throne of Persia, Syloson, still an exile, went to Susa and presented himself as a benefactor of the king. Darius could not think what Greek he was indebted to, and asked that the man who so described himself be brought to him. Syloson came before him and reminded him of the incident of the cloak. Darius remembered, and was the more grateful to Syloson because at the time when he made his gift he could not know that Darius would ever be in a position to do anything for him. He offered to give Syloson great gifts of gold and silver. But Syloson replied that he did not want gold and silver; he asked instead that Darius restore Samos to him, as his brother Polycrates was dead and the island was under the rule of a slave. Darius agreed to make him this gift. He sent forces to besiege Samos. They took it and it was restored to Syloson.

Symaethis (sim-ē'this). A sea-nymph, the mother by Faunus of Acis.

Syme (sī'mē). [Also: Simi, Symi.] Small island off the SW coast of Asia Minor, about 15 miles N of Rhodes.

Symplegades (sim-pleg'ā-dēz). In Greek legend, two rocky cliffs at the entrance to the Euxine Sea. The ancients believed that they clashed together in order to crush any vessel that tried to pass between them. Legend has it that Jason's ship, the Argo, got safely through by sending a dove first, and slipping through quickly while the rocks were opening for the bird.

Synnada (sin'a-dā). [Modern name, Eskikarahisar.] Ancient city in Phrygia, famous for its ruins of old palaces. The city was known for its marble quarries, and from the time of Constantine was the capital of Phrygia Salutaris.

Syphax (si'faks). King of the Massaesylians in W Numidia; died c201 B.C. He vacillated between Roman and Carthaginian alliances, and was often at war with Masinissa, but was finally allied with Carthage and married Sophonisba, daughter of Hasdrubal. He overran all of Numidia, but was defeated by Scipio in 203 B.C. and taken prisoner to Rome.

Syracuse (sir'a-kūs, -kūz). [Italian, Siracusa; Latin, Syracusae.] City of Sicily, situated on the island of Ortygia off the E coast of Sicily. In ancient times the largest and wealthiest city of Sicily, it was a Dorian city, founded (c734 B.C.) by Corinthian colonists under the leadership of Archias, on a site that was seized from earlier settlers. In the next century Syracuse began founding her own colonies in Sicily, and laid the foundations for the dominating position she attained among the Greek cities of the island. The government of the city was oligarchic and democratic by turns. Gelo (died c478 B.C.), tyrant of Gela, in answer to an appeal by Syracusan nobles who had been expelled by the people, made himself master and tyrant of Syracuse in 485 B.C. The splendid location of Syracuse made it a center of commerce and shipping. The island on which it stood was in the northeast part of a bay about five miles in circumference. Gelo connected the island by a causeway to Achradina, a mainland height on a promontory that commands the island. The island now became a peninsula that dropped down and enclosed the bay on the northeast. He built a wall that ran down to the bay across the promontory behind the fortified height of Achradina and enclosed it, the causeway, and the island of Ortygia in one unit. The Great Harbor of Syracuse, as the bay became, was thus protected on the north by the citadel of the city on the island and by fortified Achradina, and on its southern side by the promontory called Plemmyrion. Safe inside the Great Harbor was anchorage for a vast number of ships. On the sea side of the causeway was another, smaller harbor. Gelo shifted at will populations from cities he had conquered to populate his enlarged city, giving the nobles he imported the citizenship and making slaves of the common people who were compelled to settle in Syracuse. He joined with Theron, tyrant of Agragas, to drive the Carthaginians out of Greek Sicily, and defeated them at Himera, 480 B.C. After his victory he brought Syracuse to a peak of power and prosperity and extended its dominion. Under his successor, his brother Hiero I (ruled 478-467 B.C.), who defeated the Etruscans and destroyed their influence in southern Italy, the magnificent court of Syracuse attracted and welcomed such poets from the mainland of Greece as Aeschylus, Pindar, Simonides, and Bacchylides. Spiritual and cultural ties to the great shrines of Greece were jealously preserved by the thriving city in the west. Hiero I was followed by his brother Thrasybulus, whose lack of capacity coupled with a harsh and cruel rule precipitated a revolution. He was overthrown, a democratic government was established, and to celebrate freedom regained the Syracusans set up a huge statue of Zeus Eleutherius (Deliverer) and instituted annual games in his honor. Syracuse flourished and continued to expand, by colonizing and by extending its influence over neighboring areas, until the great expedition (under Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus) was sent (415–413 B.C.) from Athens to check the Syracusan advance, to gain influence in Sicily, and as an attack on Athens' enemy Corinth. The Athenian expedition was a disaster for Athens. The vast armament that set out from Athens with such splendor and such hope was completely destroyed. The prisoners taken by the Syracusans were set to work in the huge quarries that are still a feature of Syracuse.

Syracuse took its place now, not as the equal of the cities of Greece, but as a strong power to which they could turn, as did Sparta, for assistance. Syracuse was triumphant, but greatly weakened by the long struggle with Athens, and almost immediately had to defend herself against attack from Carthage. The democracy which had been joyfully restored after the defeat of the Athenians seemed unable to cope with the Carthaginians. Dionysius I was named sole general to counter the Carthaginian menace (405 B.C.). The fortunes of Syracuse vis-à-vis Carthage rose and fell. Dionysius made himself absolute ruler. In the course of his reign he defended Syracuse from a siege by the Carthaginians (397 B.C.), defeated them, and drove them out of all but the western corner of Sicily. Under Dionysius (c430–367 B.C.), Syracuse became the most powerful city in the Greek world, which is to say, the most powerful state in Europe at the time. At its greatest extent, the empire of Syracuse included most of Sicily and the southern part of the peninsula of Italy, into which Dionysius had successfully penetrated. The various parts of the empire were attached to Syracuse in varying degrees of dependence, alliance, and association. Dionysius enlarged and beautified the city, and improved its defenses to make it the best fortified, as well as the most magnificent, city in Sicily. He also improved the docks and increased the fleet to give Syracuse the strongest naval force in the Mediterranean. In succeeding years Syracuse suffered under the tyranny of Dionysius the Younger (c395–after 343 B.C.), son of Dionysius I, expelled him, and was governed for a time by Dion (c408–353 B.C.), a follower of Plato and a theoretical democrat who had tried to make of Dionysius the Younger a constitutional monarch. Syracuse fell again to Dionysius the Younger, but was then freed by Timoleon, a Corinthian general sent out by the mother city to free Syracuse from tyranny and from an invading Carthaginian force (343 B.C.). About 317 B.C. Agathocles (361–289 B.C.), with an army of Campanian mercenaries and Greek exiles, and with the encouragement of Carthage, made himself tyrant. He restored order to the city, which had been rocked by revolution. Under Hiero II (c307–216 B.C.), Syracuse enjoyed more than 50 years of peace, and flourished greatly under his beneficent rule. In the First Punic War between Rome and Carthage (264–241 B.C.; Syracuse had suffered her own Punic Wars), Syracuse was on the side of Rome, but Hieronymus (grandson of Hiero II), finding Rome a greater threat than Carthage ever was, changed sides in the Second Punic War (218–201 B.C.). He was dethroned in 215 B.C., and his family was murdered. Marcellus, the Roman consul and general, made such demands that the Syracusans, abetted by Carthage, determined to resist. Marcellus laid siege to the city in 214 B.C. The city was heroically defended; the inventions of the great Archimedes played havoc with the Roman ships in the Great Harbor. The city held out until the defenders, weakened by plague and lack of supplies, were compelled to submit (211 B.C.). Marcellus allowed his army to plunder the city, and many of its treasures were carried off to Rome. Though Marcellus had given strict orders to spare and protect Archimedes, in the confusion he was slain as, oblivious of the turmoil about him, he worked out a problem in the sand. Syracuse now became a Roman city in what was ultimately the Roman province of Sicily. Syracuse is famous for its Greek antiquities, including, on the island of Ortygia, remains of Doric temples of Apollo (6th century B.C.) and Athena (5th century B.C., the modern cathedral) that rest on foundations of even older temples. There are also a Greek theater, a Roman amphitheater, parts of walls and aqueducts, remains of a great fortress on the slope inland from Achradina, Roman houses, and numerous other remains. On the west side of the island of Ortygia is the celebrated fountain of Arethusa, which according to legend represents the nymph Arethusa. She fled the embraces of the river-god Alpheus and was transported to Syracuse by Artemis, where she was changed to a fountain. The river-god dove under the sea and came up in Ortygia to mingle his waters with those of the fountain of Arethusa. Through the marshes about Syracuse runs the stream Cyane. According to legend, the nymph Cyane saw Pluto (Hades) carrying off Proserpina (Persephone). She tried to persuade him to release Proserpina but he ignored her and plunged into the earth with his captive. Cyane wept so that she was changed into a fountain, the source of the stream.

Syria (sir'i-a). The region of this name described by the ancients lay probably between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean and between the N part of Arabia and the Taurus Mountains, and thus included Lebanon, Palestine, and Jordan. The inhabitants were Hittites, Arameans, Canaanites, Hebrews, and Phoenicians. (Sometimes lower Mesopotamia was included, and the names Assyria and Syria were used interchangeably by some ancient writers; this larger region is also called Aram in the Bible.) Syria became subject to Assyria c733 B.C. and was later under Babylon, Persia, and Macedon. Part of it was conquered by Seleucus Nicator and the name Syria was given to the whole realm of his descendants, the Seleucids, which had Antioch as its capital and embraced a great part of the Macedonian conquests in Asia. It was conquered by Pompey c65 B.C. and annexed to the Roman Empire. Syrinx (sir'ingks). In Greek mythology, a mountain-nymph of Arcadia. She was a huntress, like the goddess Artemis, and like her wished to remain chaste. Pan caught sight of her one day on Mount Lycaeus and pursued her. The nymph fled through the forests until she came to the river Ladon. There she prayed to the nymphs of the stream to rescue her. Just as Pan grasped her she was transformed into reeds, and as the wind blew through them they gave off a gentle singing sound. Pan cut the reeds into unequal lengths and fastened them together into a Pan's pipe, or Syrinx.

Syrus (sir'rus) or Syros (sir'ros). [Also: Siros, Syra.] The most populous and richest island of the Cyclades. The philosopher Pherecydes, the teacher of Pythagoras, was born on the island, and a cave on the north of the island called the Grotto of Pherecydes, is said to have been his home. The chief town of the island is Hermoupolis, "Hermes' city." Area of the island, about 31 square miles; length, 11 miles.

Syrtis (ser'tis). In ancient geography, a large embayment of the Mediterranean Sea, in Libya, the N coast of Africa. According to legend, it was a vast quicksand, where the Argo was driven by a great storm when the Argonauts were on their roundabout way home to Iolcus from Colchis.

Tacitus (tas'i-tus), Cornelius. Roman historian, noted also as an orator; born c55 A.D.; died probably after 117. He was praetor in 88 and consul in 97. He was a friend of the younger Pliny. His extant works include

Dialogus de Oratoribus, an "attempt to demonstrate and explain the decay of oratory in the imperial period, in the form of a dialogue between literary celebrities of the time of Vespasian"; a biography of his father-in-law Julius Agricola (De Vita et Moribus Julii Agricolae); the Germania, a celebrated ethnographical work on the Germans; the Historiae, a narrative of events in the reigns of Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian, of which only the first four books and the first half of the fifth book survive; and the Annales, a history of the Julian dynasty from the death of Augustus. Of the last work only by chance have parts survived. Originally in 16 or more books, books 1-6 depend upon a single manuscript, books 11-16 upon another single manuscript, and books 7-10 are lost. His style is compact, condensed to the utmost brevity, so that he has come to be regarded by students as a paragon of difficulty. He is devoted to objective truth, and takes rank as one of the world's most able writers on history.

Tacticus (tak'ti-kus), Aeneas. See Aeneas Tacticus.

Taenarus (tē'nā-rus) or Taenarum (-rum). Locality, city, cape, and river, at the extremity of Laconia, Greece. Near the river in this locality, according to ancient legend, there was a back entrance to Tartarus which was used by those who evaded Hermes, the conductor of the dead to Tartarus, and by those who had no coin under their tongues to pay Charon to ferry them across the Styx. It was a cave-like temple. Some say Heracles brought up Cerberus from Hades through it. Theseus too was said to have used this entrance when he descended to Hades in quest of Persephone. Near here there was a spring. Formerly those who looked into it could see ships and harbors, but a woman washed dirty clothes in it, and after that nothing could be seen in its waters. There was also an oracle of the dead at Taenarus. To those who summoned them, the dead appeared while they were asleep and answered their questions. Some Spartan suppliants once fled to the sanctuary of Poseidon here, but were seized by the Spartans and put to death. For this impiety Sparta was shaken by earthquakes (464 B.C.).

Tages (tā'jēz). An Etruscan divinity, commonly represented as a beautiful youth.

Tainaron (te'nā-rôn). See Taenarus.

Talaemenes (tal-ē'mē-nēz). Named by Homer (Iliad), as a Maeonian, the father of Mesthles and Antiphus, allies of Troy.

Talaria (tā-lā'ri-a). In classical mythology and archaeology, the sandals, bearing small wings, worn characteristically by Hermes or Mercury and often by Iris and Eos, and by other divinities, as Eros and the Furies and Harpies. In late or summary representations of the deity the sandals are sometimes omitted, so that the wings appear as if growing from the ankles, one on each side of the foot. Sometimes, especially in archaic examples, the talaria have the form of a sort of greaves bearing the wings much higher on the leg. They symbolize the faculty of swift and unimpeded passage through space.

Talaus (tā'lā-us). In Greek legend, a son of Bias and Pero and a great-grandson of Cretheus. He went from Argos to join Jason as one of the Argonauts, and was wounded in the battle with the Bebryces in the course of the journey. Talaus was the father of Adrastus, Mecisteus, and Eriphyle. He was killed by Amphiarus in a war between the descendants of Bias and those of Melampus over control of the kingdom.

Talos (tā'los). [Also: Perdix, Talus.] In Greek mythology, a son of Polycaste, or Perdix, sister of Daedalus. He was an even more marvelous smith than Daedalus, to whom he had been apprenticed when he was ten years old. It is said that he invented the saw: using the spine of a fish as a model he cut teeth in an iron blade. He was also said to have invented the potter's wheel and the compass for describing circles. Daedalus was intensely jealous of his nephew's skill. His desire to destroy Talos was spurred, some say, by a rumor that Talos had incestuous relations with his mother. He lured Talos to the top of a tower and pushed him over. He then gathered up the corpse but was discovered before he could bury it. The soul of Talos was transformed into a partridge, a bird which does not soar on the heights, as Talos remembered his fall, but flutters near the earth and lays its eggs on or near the ground. His body was buried in Athens.

Talos. In Greek mythology, a man of bronze. Some say he was created by Hephaestus. Others say he was sprung from ash trees and that he was the last one left of the sons of the gods. He was entirely of bronze. In his ankle was a pin which stoppered the ichor that ran through his body in a single vein and sustained his life. Zeus gave him to

Europa to be the guardian of Crete. Three times a day he marched around the shore of Crete, inspecting for invaders. These he repelled by hurling great rocks at them or, if they came too close, he heated himself red-hot and burned them by claspings them in his arms. When Jason and Medea, returning to Iolcus from Colchis, sailed near the shores of Crete in the Argo, Talos prevented them from landing by hurling stones at them. Medea called to him and induced him to let them land by promising him a magic potion. Instead she gave him a sleeping draught, and while he slept she pulled out the pin in his ankle. All the life-giving ichor in Talos' single vein flowed out and he died. But others say Talos scraped his ankle against a rock and, the pin being loosened, he bled to death. Still others say he met his death when he was shot in the ankle by an arrow.

Talhybius (tal-thib'i-us). In Greek legend, Agamemnon's herald. He accompanied Menelaus and Odysseus to Cyprus to seek the aid of King Cinyras in the Trojan War. As Agamemnon's herald throughout the Trojan War he had many unpleasant missions to perform. It was he who went to bring Iphigenia to be sacrificed at Aulis. He fetched Briseis when she was taken from Achilles and given to Agamemnon to make up for the loss of Chryseis. He had to tell Hecuba, after the fall of Troy, that she was to be Odysseus' captive, that Cassandra would be taken by Agamemnon, and that Andromache would go to Neoptolemus. Talhybius, for all his gruesome message-bearing, seems to have been a compassionate man. He pitied the fallen queen, Hecuba. When it was his sad duty to tell her that Astyanax, her young grandson, must die, and that her daughter Polyxena must be sacrificed on Achilles' tomb, he shuddered for her sorrows and hoped he would die rather than fall so low as the once great queen had done. When Agamemnon was slain by Clytemnestra after the war, Talhybius, according to some accounts, took care of his young son Orestes and hid him from Aegisthus. According to some accounts, he emigrated to Crete and founded Tegea there. He died either at Mycenae or in Sparta. There was a shrine to him in Sparta and a family, said to have been descended from him, had the hereditary function of state heraldry there.

Tammuz (tam'uz). [Also: Thammuz.] Ancient Babylonian god of agriculture, flocks, herds, and vegetation. He was beloved by Ishtar, who traveled into the Underworld to bring him back to earth. He personifies the life-giving powers of spring, and his annual death and resurrection symbolize the annual death and regrowth of vegetation. In his honor a feast was held every year, beginning with the new moon of the summer month Tammuz. This was a period of mourning for the death of Tammuz and a period of rejoicing for his rebirth. His story and his cult parallel those of the Phrygian Attis, the Egyptian Osiris, the Phoenician and Greek Adonis, the Old Norse Balder, and others.

Tanagra (tan'a-gra, ta-nag'ra). In ancient geography, a town of Boeotia, Greece, situated near the Asopus River, about 24 miles NW of Athens. The inhabitants in ancient times claimed descent from Apollo and Poseidon, and said their town was named for Tanagra, a daughter of Aeolus or, as some say, of the river-god Asopus. Among the temples of Tanagra in antiquity were those of Themis, Apollo, Aphrodite, Hermes, and Dionysus. In the last was a marble image of the god by the sculptor Calamis. There was also an image of a headless Triton. According to legend, a Triton attacked the women of Tanagra when they went to bathe in the sea to purify themselves before celebrating the rites of Dionysus. The women called on the god to protect them; he came and killed the Triton after a great struggle. But others say the Triton used to come from the sea and attack the cattle of the Tanagraeans. To catch him, a bowl of wine was set on the beach. The Triton drank of it and fell into a drunken slumber on the sand, whereupon a man of Tanagra cut off his head. Some say the tomb of Orion was at Tanagra. The tomb of the lyric poetess Corinna was also there, with a painting depicting her binding her hair with the victor's crown after a contest with Pindar. A victory was gained here in 457 B.C. by the Spartans over the Athenians and their allies. Its extensive necropolis has made this obscure town famous, for from it came (c1874) the first of the charming Tanagra figurines of terra-cotta which drew attention to the antiquities of this type. Such figurines, previously ignored, have since been eagerly sought and found in great quantities not only at Tanagra but upon a great number of sites in all parts of the Greek world.

Tanais (tan'ā-is). Ancient Greek (Milesian) colony near the head of the Palus Maeotis. The colony dates from c500 B.C. and was probably founded by settlers from Panticapaeum.

Tanais. [Modern name, Don.] In ancient geography, a river of Scythia, flowing generally south to empty into the Palus Maeotis. A trade route to Central Asia was said to follow the valley of this river.

Tanaquil (tan'ā-kwil). In Roman legend, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus (q.v.), fifth king of Rome.

Tanarus (tan'ā-rus). [Modern name, Tanaro.] River in NW Italy. It rises in the Ligurian Alps and empties into the Po.

Tanit (tā'nit). [Also: Tanith.] Carthaginian goddess, identified with the Phoenician mother goddess, Astarte. The Greeks identified her with their own goddess Aphrodite.

The Romans confused her with Juno, the reason being that as goddess of women and childbirth she resembled Juno in her Lucina aspect. Tanit possessed also the same moon-goddess aspect as her counterpart Astarte. Tantalus (tan'ta-lus). In Greek mythology, some say Tantalus was a son of Zeus, or of Tmolus, the god of Mount Tmolus in Libya. Others say he was a king of Argos or of Corinth, or of Sipylus in Libya. He was the father of Pelops, Niobe, and Broteas. Tantalus was most fortunate in being on intimate terms with the gods and dined often at their table. But he abused the confidence of the gods. He stole the nectar and ambrosia on which they fed, and which confers immortality on those who partake of it, and gave it to his mortal friends. He also, according to some accounts, committed a horrible crime. When the gods were invited to dine with him, he cut up his son Pelops and boiled the pieces in a cauldron. Some say he served the gods this gruesome meal to test their omniscience. The gods were instantly aware of the contents of the dish set before them and all, except Demeter, refused to eat of it. She was so preoccupied with her grief over the disappearance of her daughter Persephone that she distractedly ate part of the left shoulder. Pindar, on the other hand, says that Poseidon had fallen in love with Pelops and stolen him away. Zeus punished Tantalus for his ingratitude for the favors bestowed on him by the gods by destroying his kingdom. Tantalus then committed a third crime. Zeus had been guarded in his infancy by a golden dog made by Hephaestus. It was stolen by Pandareus and given into Tantalus' hands for safe-keeping. When Pandareus came to claim the dog, Tantalus swore by Zeus that he knew nothing about it. Zeus heard that Tantalus had taken an oath in his name and sent Hermes to investigate. On learning that the oath was false, he crushed Tantalus under a huge stone on Mount Sipylus. Some say, however, that Tantalus stole the golden dog himself, and that Pandareus was the receiver. But the fact remains that Tantalus swore falsely in the name of Zeus that he knew nothing of the matter. Zeus continues to torment Tantalus in Tartarus, the Underworld. For his first two crimes he is condemned to stand forever in water up to his neck, but whenever he stoops to drink of it, the water recedes. Around him grow trees bearing luscious fruits, but when he stretches a hand to eat one of them, they sway beyond his reach. For his third crime, a huge stone perches constantly over his head, ever on the verge of falling and crushing him. It is from Tantalus, and his fate of ever having food and drink just beyond his grasp, that the word "tantalize" is derived.

Tantalus. In Greek legend, a son of Broteas. He was a king of Pisa. He was married to Clytemnestra, daughter of Tyndareus of Sparta, and had one son by her. Agamemnon attacked Pisa, killed Tantalus and his infant son, and forced Clytemnestra to marry him. The bones of Tantalus were buried in a large bronze vessel at Argos.

Taormina (tä-ôr-mē'nä). See Tauromenium.

Taphiae (tä'fi-ē). [Also: Teleboides.] In ancient geography, a group of the Ionian Islands W of Acarnania, Greece. Homer called the people of the islands "Lovers of the oar." The Taphians raided the cattle of Electryon, father of Alcmena, and killed eight of his sons. Amphitryon, husband of Alcmena, raised an army, marched against the Taphians, defeated them, and gave their lands to his allies.

Taphius (tä'fi-us). In Greek legend, a son of Hippothoë (granddaughter of Perseus) and Poseidon. He was born in the Echinades islands. He went to the island of Taphos, colonized it, and called the people Teleboans, because he had gone "far from his native land." His son was Pterelaus, who was made immortal by Poseidon with a gift of one golden, or purple, lock of hair which rendered him invulnerable.

Taranis (tar'a-nis). Ancient thunder god of Gaul, identified by the Romans with their own Jupiter. He is said to have been worshiped with human sacrifices.

Taranto (tä-ran'tō). See Tarentum.

Taraxippus (ta-rak-sip'us). In Greek antiquity, a pillar shaped like a round altar at the turning-point of the course in the hippodrome at Olympia, which was believed mysteriously to terrify the competing horses, and thus cause the frequent accidents at this point of the course. Some say Taraxippus, "Horse-scarer," was Olenius, an Elean skilled in horsemanship; others say he was Dameon, who accompanied Heracles against Augeas and was killed with his horse by Cteatus, son of Actor, who buried man and horse together. And some say that on this spot Pelops sacrificed to Myrtilus, whom he had murdered and cast into the sea, and named the empty mound he raised "Taraxippus" because of the trick by which Myrtilus frightened the horses of Oenomaus and allowed Pelops to win the race for his daughter Hippodamia's hand. Others say Taraxippus is Oenomaus himself; and still others say it is Alcathous, one of the suitors of Hippodamia, who met his death here in the race with Oenomaus for her hand, and who out of spite frightens the horses of all other racers. Whoever Taraxippus was, he was thought to frighten the horses in chariot races unless propitiated by the sacrifices which charioteers carefully offered him before their races.

Taraxippus. Said by some to be the ghost of Glaucus, the owner of mares that he refused to allow to breed and by which he was torn to pieces. It was said to haunt the Isthmus of Corinth and frighten horses at the Isthmian Games, causing the death of many charioteers. Others said Taraxippus was a dwarflike spirit that rode behind men on horseback and frightened their horses. It was thought to be the spirit of a rider or driver who had been killed, and sacrifices were offered to propitiate it.

Tarchetius (tär-kē'ti-us). In Roman legend, a king of Alba Longa. He was haunted by a phantom that emerged from his hearth, and was told that if his daughter married the phantom, the child of their union would become famous. When his daughter refused and sent a maid in her place, Tarchetius, enraged, was on the point of killing both but was warned by Vesta in a dream to spare them. Twins were born to the maid, who gave them to Teratius to protect them from Tarchetius. Teratius left them near a stream and they were nursed by a wolf and fed by birds until they were found and cared for by a shepherd. When they grew up, they overthrew Tarchetius. This story, told by Plutarch, is one of several variants of the story of Romulus and Remus and the subsequent founding of Rome.

Tarchon (tär'kon). In Roman legend, a Lydian who went to Italy with Tyrrhenus and founded the Etruscan race. He gave his name to the city of Tarquinii and later, as leader of the Etruscans, he agreed to help Aeneas in his war against Turnus and the Latins.

Tarentinus Sinus (ta-ren-tī'nus sī'nus). [Modern name, Gulf of Taranto.] Arm of the Mediterranean, on the S coast of Italy. It separates the "heel" of the peninsula from the "toe," projecting into the "foot" about 85 miles.

Tarentum (ta-ren'tum). [Also: Taras; modern name, Taranto.] In ancient geography, a city of SE Italy, situated on a sheltered harbor on the N coast of the Gulf of Tarentum. The ancient name of Taras was given to it, according to some accounts, in honor of a son of Poseidon of that name. According to tradition, this ancient Dorian city was founded by Phalanthus, c707 B.C., who led a colony across the sea from Laconia and raised the city. It prospered, owing to its fertile soil, its protected harbor, and its manufacture of fabrics, dyed wools, and pottery, which were known throughout the Mediterranean area. Tarentum established colonies of her own on the east coast of Italy, and became the most powerful city of Magna Graecia. In the 4th century B.C. the city was threatened by the Lucanians, appealed to Sparta for aid, and received a force from there under the command of King Archidamus. The Spartan expedition was ineffectual. King Archidamus fell in battle (338 B.C.). Tarentum next appealed to Alexander of Epirus, uncle of Alexander the Great. He beat back the Italian tribes with great energy. The speed and vigor with which he established his control came to seem a greater threat to Tarentum than the Italian tribes had been. However, having greatly weakened the enemies of Tarentum, Alexander was treacherously slain and Tarentum was freed from both native and foreign threats for a time. At the beginning of the 3rd century B.C. the growing power of Rome became a menace. The Tarentines invited Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, to come and command them in a war against Rome. He arrived to find the city luxuriating in its wealth and making no great effort to arm itself for the coming war. After great but costly successes against Rome, Pyrrhus went to Sicily. Tarentum was defeated by the Romans, 272 B.C., and became a Roman ally. In the Second Punic War the city was captured by Hannibal. It was taken (209 B.C.) and plundered by Fabius Cunctator, thanks to betrayal by some Bruttians in the city. Fabius slew many of the Tarentines and sold 30,000 others into slavery. Among the spoils which he removed from the city was a statue of Heracles. This he sent to Rome and caused it to be set up near a statue of himself. In 123 B.C. the city was colonized by Rome with the new name Colonia Neptunia, and an attempt was made to revive its industry. Architectural remains of antiquity include a Doric temple on an island in the harbor, and a Roman aqueduct.

Targitaus (tär-gi-tā'us). Said by some to have been a son of Zeus and a daughter of the river-god Borysthenes. He was said to have been the first inhabitant of Scythia. His sons were Arpoxais, Lipoxais, and Colaxais, the legendary founders of several Scythian tribes.

Tarne (tär'nē). In the Iliad, another name for Sardis, the capital of Lydia.

Tarpeia (tär-pē'ā). In Roman legend, daughter of Spurius Tarpeius, governor of the citadel of Rome on the Capitoline Hill. Following the rape of the Sabine women by Romulus, Titus Tatius, king of the Sabines, waged war on Rome. Tarpeia, a vestal virgin, was accustomed to go outside the citadel to fetch water from the sacred spring of the Camenae. She was approached by Titus Tatius who bribed her with gold to admit armed men into the fortress. Some say she betrayed the fortress to the Sabines in return for "what they wore on their left arms." She meant their gold bracelets, but as they entered, the Sabines cast their shields upon her (which they also bore on their left arms) and she was crushed to death. The Tarpeian Rock was named for her.

Tarpeian Rock (tär-pē'an). [Latin, Mons Tarpeius.] Originally, the name of the entire Capitoline Hill in Rome, or at least of the peak occupied by the citadel, in memory of the treason of Tarpeia in connection with the Sabine siege; later, that part (Rupes Tarpeia) of the cliff of the Capitoline over whose precipice, according to tradition, condemned criminals were hurled; now unrecognizable owing to artificial and natural changes in the rocks.

Tarquinii (tär-kwin'i-i). [Former name, Corneto Tarquinia; modern name, Tarquinia.] City in Latium, in C Italy, about 44 miles NW of Rome. Its name derives from Tarchon, the Etruscan ally of Aeneas. The town, surrounded by walls and fortifications, has numerous Etruscan and Roman antiquities, and a necropolis of great interest, containing notable murals. One of the 12 chief Etruscan cities, it submitted to Roman rule in the 3rd century B.C. In Roman legend it was the original residence of Tarquinius Priscus.

Tarquinius Collatinus (tär-kwin'i-us kol-a-ti'nus). In Roman legend, the husband of Lucretia, and a kinsman of Tarquinius Superbus. His wife was ravished by Tarquinius Sextus, son of Tarquinius Superbus. The outrage precipitated revolt against the Tarquins and they were driven out of Rome (509 B.C.). The kings of Rome were succeeded by two consuls. Lucius Junius Brutus who led the revolt was one, and Tarquinius Collatinus as the man who had most reason to hate Tarquinius Superbus and his family was the other. Some say that Tarquinius resigned his consulship and withdrew from Rome because he had appeared too mild in punishing the conspirators who sought to restore Tarquinius Superbus, and thus he earned the distrust of the Romans. Others say the Romans hated the very name Tarquinius and had no confidence in Collatinus because of his family connections. Their uneasiness reached such proportions that Brutus sought to quiet them by asking Collatinus to leave Rome. "Depart, our friend . . ." he is said to have urged, "the people are persuaded that with the family of Tarquinius the kingship will vanish from among us." Collatinus was astonished at the evidence of distrust. However, since Brutus promised that he could take his possessions with him and would even add to them if they were insufficient, Collatinus decided it was better to go before the temper of the people became dangerous and forced him to flee empty-handed. He resigned his consulship and retired to Lavinium.

Tarquinius Priscus (pris'kus), Lucius. In Roman tradition, the fifth king of Rome. He succeeded Ancus Marcius and was said to have reigned 616-578 B.C. Mistakenly called, in Roman accounts, Lucumo, which was a title given to Etruscan princes and priests, he was the son of Demaratus, a Greek from Corinth who had gone as a colonist to the Etruscan city of Tarquinii. A man of great wealth, his wife was Tanaquil, a woman of exalted birth, intelligence and ambition. She persuaded him to leave Tarquinii, where the Etruscans denied him the honor due him because they regarded him as an alien upstart, and remove to Rome, a new and growing city where he could achieve a position of power and influence. When they reached the Janiculum at Rome, an eagle flew down, plucked off his cap, and flew up to heaven with it. The eagle circled, dived, and gently placed the cap back on his head. Tanaquil, expert at augury, was delighted with the omen of greatness brought by the eagle from Jupiter. They continued into the city and took a house there. In Rome he adopted the new name of Lucius Tarquinius Priscus. He quickly made many friends with his generosity and courtesy, and soon became an intimate friend of the king, who consulted him on many matters and named him as guardian of his children. When the king died, Tarquinius sent his sons, now young men, off on a hunting expedition and urged the Comitia to choose a king without delay. He was unanimously chosen by the Comitia. One of his first acts was to double the size of the Senate in order to be sure of senators favorable to himself. Tarquinius Priscus marked out the Circus Maximus; defeated the Latins again and took much booty and many cities from them; defeated the Sabines and added their city of Collatia to Rome; drained the marshes about Rome and built the original cloacae (sewers); undertook the work of raising a wall about Rome; and laid the foundations for a temple of Jupiter on the Capitol, as he had vowed to do during the Sabine war. The sons of Ancus had never been reconciled to the fact that Tarquinius succeeded their father. They plotted against him, and sent two desperate shepherds to see him on the pretense that the shepherds wished him to settle a dispute. According to plan, the shepherds quarreled violently before Tarquinius. Having listened to one of them, he turned his head to hear the other; the first shepherd took that opportunity to cleave his head with an ax, and Tarquinius died shortly thereafter.

Tarquinius, Sextus. Youngest son of Tarquinius Superbus. He was sent to Gabii by his father, who had failed to take that city by storm. According to some accounts, he told the Gabini he was fleeing the harshness of his father, and so won their confidence that they awarded him a position of great power in their councils. He continually urged the Gabini to make forays against Rome, and in these he was the leader. According to plan, the Gabini were successful in these raids and the reputation of Sextus became so great that his was the most influential voice in the city. He sent an envoy to his father, so the story goes, telling him he was now in control of Gabii and asking his father for instructions. In a procedure reminiscent of that of Thrasybulus, tyrant of Miletus, replying to Periander (c625-585 B.C.), tyrant of Corinth, Tarquinius is said to have refused to utter a word to the envoy of Sextus. Instead he walked about his garden with him, knocking off the heads of the tallest poppies that grew there. When the envoy returned and described his actions, Sextus knew he was to get rid of the leading men in Gabii. This he did by means of false charges, murders, and exile. Thereupon he delivered an unresisting city to Tarquinius. Later, when the Romans were besieging the Rutulian city of Ardea, Sextus and other young nobles fell to discussing the virtues of their wives. On the suggestion of Tarquinius Collatinus they agreed to ride to Rome and surprise their wives. Lucretia, wife of Collatinus, was found to be industriously engaged with her maids in household tasks. The other wives were feasting and amusing themselves. Lucretia easily won the palm for being the most virtuous of the wives. Sextus was aroused not only by her beauty but also by her reputation for chastity. He returned to her house in Collatia some nights later by himself. Lucretia received him graciously as a colleague and kinsman of her husband. During the night he entered her chamber and ravished her, after threatening that if she did not submit, he would kill her and lay the naked body of a slave beside her so that she would appear convicted of adultery in its vilest form. When Sextus left her, she sent for her husband and her father, revealed what had happened and, adjuring them to avenge her, committed suicide. This deed of Sextus precipitated the revolt against the Tarquins and resulted in their expulsion from Rome (509 B.C.). Sextus fled to Gabii, but there, because of his former cruelties and betrayals, he was put to death by the outraged Gabini.

Tarquinius Superbus (sö-pér'bus), Lucius. In Roman tradition, the seventh and last king of Rome (534-510 B.C.); son of Tarquinius Priscus, and son-in-law of Servius Tullius. In the traditional account he was married to Tullia, daughter of Servius Tullius. His brother Aruns was also married to a daughter of Servius Tullius, who was also named Tullia. According to some accounts, Tullia, wife of Aruns, was ruthless and ambitious; her husband was neither. Tullia, wife of Lucius Tarquinius, was of the same mild disposition as Aruns. Tullia, wife of Aruns, contrived the murder of her husband and of her sister, and married her brother-in-law, Lucius Tarquinius. Some say she continually urged him to seek the throne which, she claimed, her own father occupied unjustly. Lucius Tarquinius was of the same mind. He won many young Romans to his side by extravagant promises and with this backing went to the Senate House and seated himself on the throne. When Servius, now an old man, hurried to the Senate and challenged him, he seized the aged king, carried him out of the chamber, and flung him into the street. In the confusion, the aides of Servius were scattered or fled. At Tullia's suggestion, some say, Tarquinius sent agents to pursue Servius as he made his way alone through the streets and slay him. Later Tullia, on her way home, drove her chariot over her dead father's body. With the supporters he won to his side, Tarquinius made himself master of Rome. He immediately showed his cruelty by refusing to permit the burial of his father-in-law's body. One of his first acts was to demand a bodyguard, lest another attempt to seize power, as he had successfully done. To consolidate his power he tried capital offenses himself without the assistance of advisers. Thus he assumed the power of life and death over his enemies. He reduced the Senate by bringing charges against many of its members, sentencing some to death and others to exile, and seizing their property in either case. He broke with the tradition that the king consult the Senate, and he made war, signed treaties, and concluded peace without referring to that body. In order to strengthen himself outside Rome he made friends with the cities of the Latin peoples. By bribery and fraud he secured the death of the one Latin leader who dared speak against him, Turnus Herdonius. For his arrogant flaunting of traditional Roman forms and his tyrannical acts, Tarquinius was given the name Superbus, "the Proud." Tarquinius began the wars against the Volsci, which continued intermittently for the next 200 years. He seized Pometia from them. He waged war on Gabii, but when he could not storm the city, according to Livy, he resorted to guile. He sent his youngest son, Sextus, as his agent. Sextus went to Gabii as a suppliant, claiming that his father was as harsh to his children as he was to his subjects, and asked asylum of the Gabini. The Gabini were completely taken in by his words, admitted him to their city, and gradually gave him such power that he was able to deliver the city to Tarquinius without a struggle. Tarquinius also made peace with the Aequi, made an alliance with the Etruscans, and sent out colonists from Rome to Signia and Circeii. In Rome he engaged on a vast program of public works, among which was a temple of Jupiter which he proposed to raise with the plunder from the Volscian city of Pometia. All the ancient shrines, except that of Terminus, on the Capitol were moved, so that the place would clearly belong to Jupiter. The Romans became restless under the harsh rule of Tarquinius. In the palace a prodigy occurred when a snake glided out of a wooden pillar. Tarquinius dared not entrust the interpretation of such a prodigy to the Etruscan soothsayers who usually performed this service, and sent his sons Titus and Aruns to Delphi. According to legend, the priestess told them he who first kissed his mother would become king of Rome. Lucius Junius Brutus, their cousin who accompanied them, on hearing this pretended to stumble, fell, and kissed the earth, the Great Mother. During a siege of Ardea, a city of the Rutulians, Sextus, the youngest son of Tarquinius Superbus, rode to Collatia and there ravished Lucretia, wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. She called her husband and her father to her, revealed what had happened, asked them to punish the criminal, and then plunged a dagger into her breast. Lucius Junius Brutus, who was present, lifted the dagger, dripping with Lucretia's blood, and swore to pursue and drive out of Rome Tarquinius Superbus, his wife, and his evil children. A similar oath was sworn by the others present. They carried the corpse of Lucretia to the market-place in Collatia. A great crowd gathered, and all who saw Lucretia's body remembered some evil Tarquinius Superbus had brought to him. Brutus urged them to take up arms and march on Rome. They did so, and a crowd gathered in the Forum. Brutus, who had always appeared slow-witted, amazed the assemblage with an impassioned speech calling for the expulsion of the Tarquins. Meanwhile, Tarquinius Superbus, at Ardea, learned what was going forward. He hurriedly set out for Rome but found the gates barred against him on arrival. He went into exile at Caere but by no means gave up his hopes of returning to Rome as king. A plot to kill the consuls who succeeded him as rulers of Rome failed. He appealed for aid to the people of Tarquinii and Veii. They sent forces to help him but they were defeated by the Romans under the consul Publius Valerius (Publicola), in a battle in which Brutus, the first consul, was killed. Tarquinius next sought aid from Lars Porsena of Clusium, the most powerful of the Etruscan kings. The forces of Lars Porsena besieged Rome. This action ended after some months in a peace treaty between Rome and Lars Porsena. Tarquinius again appealed to Lars Porsena, but this time, after parley with eminent Romans, Lars Porsena refused him aid, and said he would no longer give him asylum. Tarquinius Superbus went to the Latin city of Tusculum to live with his son-in-law. About 500 B.C., in a war between the Romans and Latins, he took part and was wounded at Lake Regillus. He never regained power in Rome, and died, some say, at Cumae, 495 B.C.

Tarracina (tar-ā-sī'nā). [Also: Anxur; modern name, Terracina.] In ancient geography, a town of C Italy, situated on the Mediterranean Sea about 58 miles SE of Rome. It was an ancient Volscian town and was taken by the Romans in 406 B.C. Roman remains include the ancient forum, whose original paving survives as the paving of the piazza in front of the cathedral (the dedicatory inscription, A. AEMILIVS.A.F., can be clearly read in the channels cut for the inlay of bronze letters, though the letters themselves were long ago pried up as scrap metal); a temple on whose foundations stands the cathedral; another temple, of the Augustan or post-Augustan period, with three cellas, exposed by World War II bombing; extensive city walls of polygonal limestone masonry of various periods, the earliest probably to be referred to the founding of a Roman citizen colony in 329 B.C.; paved stretches of the Via Appia; tombs; on the hill above the city, further fortification walls of concrete and rubble ("opus incertum") of c100 B.C., and the imposing substructure of a large temple of Jupiter Anxur, of about the same date; on the shore road just east of the city is a famous piece of Roman engineering—the scarp or vertical cut in the rock face made to permit the Via Appia to pass at sea level. (JJ).

Tarsus (tār'sus). In ancient geography, the capital of Cilicia, Asia Minor, situated on the Cydnus River. It was an important city in the Persian period, became partly Hellenized and the seat of a school of philosophy, and received important concessions from the Romans. It was the birthplace of the apostle Paul.

Tartarus (tār'tā-rus). In Greek mythology, an earth-god; some say he came into being after Gaea, but others say he was the child of Gaea and Aether (Air). By Gaea he was the father of the monster Typhon.

Tartarus. Deep and sunless abyss, according to Homer and also to earlier Greek mythology, situated in the lowest region of the Underworld. Here Zeus imprisoned the rebel Titans. Later poets described Tartarus as the place in which the wicked were punished.

Sometimes the name is synonymous with the lower world in general.

Tartessus (tär-tes'us). In ancient geography, a city and region in the SW part of the Iberian Peninsula, near the Pillars of Hercules. It was noted for its commerce. It is associated with Gades (modern Cádiz) and also with the Biblical Tarshish.

Tatius (tā'shus), Titus. In Roman legend, a king of the Sabines who attacked Rome after the rape of the Sabine women. The women, however, brought about a reconciliation, and Tatius is said to have ruled thereafter conjointly with Romulus.

Taura (tôr'a). In Roman mythology, a sterile cow, such an animal being sacred to the infernal gods.

Tauri (tô'rī) or Taurians (tô'ri-anz). An ancient warlike and barbarous people dwelling in the Chersonesus Taurica (Crimea), thought by some to have been the same as the Cimmerians. According to some accounts, when Iphigenia was about to be sacrificed at Aulis in order to appease Artemis and bring favorable winds for the Greek fleet on its way to Troy, she was miraculously spirited away and a hind was left in her place. She was transported to the Taurians by Artemis and became a priestess in her temple there. As described by Herodotus, the Taurians worshiped Artemis in the following manner. They offered as sacrifice to the virgin goddess all strangers who were shipwrecked on their coasts, and all Greeks who were forced by the weather to put into their harbors. After the victim was made ready, he was struck on the head with a club. His head was severed from his body and nailed to a cross, while the body was hurled from the cliff on which the temple stood into the sea, or as some said, the body was buried. In the time of Herodotus, the Taurians claimed that the goddess to whom they sacrificed these victims was Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon. When a Taurian took a captive in war, he cut off his head, carried it to his house and nailed it to a tall pole above the house, so that thereafter the whole house was under the protection of the captive's head.

Taurian Games (tô'ri-an). [Also: Tarentine or Terentine Games.] Name under the Roman republic for the games called secular (ludi Taurini (tô-rī'nī). Ancient Ligurian people which dwelt in the valley of the upper Po, Italy.

Taurisci (tô-ris'ī). Celtic people which dwelt in the ancient Roman province of Noricum in the Alps. The Taurisci were the chief tribe of the region and became tributary to Rome c35 B.C.

Tauromenium (tô-rō-mē'ni-um). [Modern name, Taormina.] In ancient geography, a city on the NE coast of Sicily, just N of Mount Aetna. It was founded by the Carthaginian general, Himilco, 397 B.C., on the hills above the old Greek city of Naxos which had been destroyed by Dionysius the Elder of Syracuse. Himilco intended it as a stronghold for the Sicels and as a bastion against the Greeks. A few years later it was unsuccessfully besieged by Dionysius, to whom it was ultimately awarded, 392 B.C., in the conclusion of a peace treaty with Carthage. Dionysius settled his mercenaries there. After the death of Dionysius it became independent and received (358 B.C.) the former inhabitants of Naxos within its walls to revive ancient Naxos in Tauromenium. In the Punic Wars between Rome and Carthage it was allied with Rome. It was a place of refuge for the rebellious slaves in the Roman civil war, and in the reign of Augustus it became a Roman colony. There are architectural remains of antiquity, especially two Roman theaters, one of which rests on Greek foundations, remains of a 3rd-century B.C. Greek temple, known as the temple of Serapis, into which the church of S. Pancrazio has been built, and walls, houses, and tombs of the Roman period. The modern city of Taormina, on the ancient site, is famous for the magnificent views it commands of Mount Aetna to the south and the mountains of Calabria across the sea in the Italian peninsula.

Taurus (tô'rus). According to a Cretan story, Taurus was a general under King Minos. At funeral games held for Androgeus, Taurus won all the contests he entered. The prizes which he won were Athenian youths and maidens sent every nine years as tribute to Minos to atone for the death of his son

Androgeus. Thus, according to the Cretans, there was no Minotaur, part man and part bull, who devoured the young Athenians, but a powerful and arrogant general, whose name means "bull," who won the Athenians as prizes and employed them as slaves. When Theseus came as part of the tribute, he asked permission to take part in the contests. Minos was annoyed with the arrogance of Taurus and in addition suspected him of an intrigue with Queen Pasiphaë (this accounts for the story that Pasiphaë loved a bull). He gladly gave Theseus his permission to compete in the games, and was delighted when Theseus three times hurled Taurus to the ground in a wrestling match. He rewarded Theseus by giving him the young Athenians who had been sent to Crete as tribute, and allowed them to depart with him.

Taxila (tak'si-lā). In ancient geography, a city in the Punjab, India, in the vicinity of the modern Rawalpindi. Alexander the Great reached it, 326 B.C., in his march into India, and was obsequiously received.

Taxiles (tak'si-lēz). Indian king in the Punjab who received Alexander the Great, 326 B.C., on his march into India. His real name was Omphis, but he was called Taxiles after his city, Taxila.

Taxiles. Leading general of Mithridates VI; fl. in the 1st century B.C.

Taÿgete (tā-ij'ē-tē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pleione and Atlas; one of the Pleiades. She was transformed into a hind by Artemis so that she could escape the pursuit of Zeus. In gratitude, she dedicated a hind to Artemis, which some say was the Cerynean Hind captured by Heracles. Zeus discovered Taÿgete's disguise and ravished her. She became the mother of Lacedaemon and then hanged herself on the mountain which thereafter bore her name, Mount Taÿgetus. With her sisters', her image was placed among the stars. See Pleiades.

Taÿgetus (tā-ij'ē-tus). Highest mountain range in the Peloponnesus, Greece. It is situated in the W part of Laconia, on the border between Laconia and Messenia, extending into Arcadia. Length, 70 miles; highest point, Hagios Elias (about 7903 feet). The mountain was named for the Pleiad Taÿgete who bore Lacedaemon to Zeus. On one of the peaks, sacred to Helius, horses were sacrificed by the Spartans. On the wild slopes, haunt of deer, bears, wild goats, and other animals, weak and sickly Spartan infants were exposed to die, so that the state would not have the burden of rearing any children that would not be fit soldiers.

Tearless Battle. Battle (367 B.C.) between the allied Arcadians and Argives on one side and the Spartans on the other: so called because the Spartans did not lose a man as they inflicted great loss on the Arcadians and drove them back.

Tecmessa (tek-mes'a). In Greek legend, a daughter of Teuthras, a king in Thrace. Telamonian Ajax attacked her father's city, killed him, and carried off Tecmessa as his concubine along with rich treasure. She was treated with all the honor due a wife and loved him dearly. She bore him one son, Eurysaces.

Tectamus (tek'tā-mus). In Greek legend, a son of Dorus; he is said to have taken a colony to Crete, where he became the father of that Asterius who ultimately married Europa.

Tegea (tē'jē-ā). In ancient geography, a city in E Arcadia, Greece. The Tegeans said that it was originally the land around their city that was named for Tegeates, son of Lycaon, and that the city itself, also named for him, was founded by Aleus. Tegea was the site of a famous temple of Athena Alea, founded by Aleus. The ancient temple was burned, c394 B.C., and as restored by Scopas it was a Doric peripteros of six by 13 columns, measuring 72 by 154 feet. There were many sanctuaries, as of Aphrodite, Artemis, Demeter and the Maid, and many images. In the sanctuary of Ilithyia was an image of "Auge on her Knees," because, some say, when Aleus gave her to Nauplius to take her off and drown her because she had profaned the temple of Athena Alea with Heracles, she fell on her knees before the temple of Ilithyia and gave birth to a son. But others tell a different tale. Most of the altars of the Tegeans stood on a lofty site in their city, and here the Tegeans feasted annually.

Men of Tegea went to join the Greeks in the war against Troy under the command of Agapenor, son of Ancaeus the Argonaut. The Tegeans were the first of the Arcadians to defeat the Lacedaemonians. Charillus, king of Sparta, deceived by an oracle into thinking he could conquer Tegea, took fetters with which to bind his Tegean prisoners and attacked Tegea. His attack was unsuccessful. Aided by the Tegean women, who took up arms, the Tegeans defeated the Lacedaemonians and took many captives. In honor of their capture of the Spartans the Tegeans thereafter held a festival, the Halotia (Capture Festival). The fetters the Spartans had brought were placed on themselves, and they were forced to till the fields of the Tegeans as slaves. Many times the Spartans sought to conquer the Tegeans, but each time they were repulsed. According to legend, there were two reasons why Tegea was invulnerable to Sparta. First, some say that Athena gave Cepheus, king of Tegea and the son of Aleus, a lock of the hair of Medusa and that this protected the city. The sanctuary of Athena Poliatas (Keeper of the City) was also called Eryma (Defense) for this reason. Second, some say that the bones of Orestes were buried in Tegea and that as long as they rested there the Spartans could not defeat the Tegeans. At last the Spartans learned from the priestess of Delphi that they must secure the bones of Orestes and restore them to Sparta if they would conquer Tegea. Lichas, a Spartan, by trickery discovered that the bones of Orestes were buried beneath a forge in Tegea, secured their removal, and restored them to Sparta. After this, whenever the Spartans contended with the Tegeans, they were always victorious.

In the Persian War, 500 Tegeans served under Leonidas at the Pass of Thermopylae but did not take part in the final struggle and defeat there, as they were sent away with the other allies when Leonidas learned that the Persians had been led around the mountain and were about to cut off the Greeks in the pass. At the Battle of Plataea (479 B.C.) the Tegeans claimed the right to command one wing of the army facing the Persians. They based their claim to this distinction on the feat of their ancestor Echemus, who had slain Hyllus when the Heraclidae first invaded the Peloponnesus. Their claim did not prevail; the Athenians put forth more cogent reasons why they should have the honor. However, the Spartans, whose right to command one wing no one questioned, placed the Tegeans next to themselves in recognition of their courage. They did well in doing so, for in the great struggle at Plataea that decided the fate of Greece, through a confusion in commands the Spartans alone were left to face the army of Mardonius, and their Tegean allies remained firmly at their side and rushed into the fray with them. The Tegeans were the first to enter the wooden fortress to which the Persians had been driven by the onrush of the Spartans and the Tegeans, and they were the first to reach and plunder the tent of Mardonius. Among the booty given to the Tegeans for their part in the battle was a bronze manger from which the Persian horses fed. The Tegeans placed it in the temple of Athena Alea at Tegea. According to Herodotus, of the 1500 Tegeans who took part in the engagement, 16 fell and were buried with full honors in a common grave on the field at Plataea. Tegea sided with Sparta in the Peloponnesian and Corinthian wars, was later a member of the Arcadian Confederacy against Sparta, fought against Sparta at Mantinea in 362 B.C., and was a member of the Aetolian and Achaean leagues.

Tegeates (te-jé'a-tēz). In Greek tradition, the son of Lycaon, for whom the region around the city of Tegea, founded later by Aleus, was named. Some say it was in the time of Tegeates that Apollo and Artemis visited Tegea to punish the persecutors of Leto. Tegeates sacrificed to them and appeased them. The tomb of Tegeates and his wife Maera was in Tegea. The sons of Tegeates were Cydon, Gortys, and Archedius. Some say they migrated to Crete and founded the cities of Cydonia, Gortyna, and Catreus there. But the Cretans denied this. They said Cydon, a son of Hermes and Acacallis, founded Cydonia; Catreus, son of Minos, founded Catreus; and Gortys, son of Rhadamanthys, founded Gortyna.

Tegyrius (te-jī'ri-us). In Greek legend, a king of Thrace. Eumolpus fled to his kingdom with his son Ismarus when he was forced out of Libya, and Tegyrius received him kindly. But Tegyrius, on discovering that Eumolpus was plotting against him, later drove him out of the kingdom. Still later, he was reconciled with Eumolpus and made him heir to his throne.

Teiresias (tī-rē'si-as). See Tiresias.

Telamon (tel'a-mōn). In Greek legend, a son of Aeacus, king of Aegina, and Endeïs. He was the brother of Peleus and the half-brother of Phocus. Telamon and Peleus were jealous of Phocus because of his skill as an athlete and because he was their father's favorite. Encouraged by their mother, they schemed to kill him. In the course of an athletic contest to which they had challenged him, Phocus was struck by a discus, as if accidentally, and then slain with an ax. Which one of the brothers administered the fatal blow is not certain,

but together they buried Phocus' body and fled. Telamon went to Salamis and sent back messengers to his father claiming he had no part in the murder. Aeacus forbade him to set foot on Aegina. In order to discuss the matter with Aeacus, Telamon secretly caused a mole to be built out into the sea from Aegina. He then stood on the end of the mole and shouted his plea of innocence to Aeacus. But Aeacus refused to believe him and Telamon returned to Salamis. There he married Glaucē, daughter of King Cychreus, and succeeded Cychreus to the throne. When Glaucē died, Telamon married Periboea. She was about to bear a child when Heracles visited at their court on his way to attack Troy. He prayed that Telamon's wife would bear a son as tough and brave as a lion. An eagle at once swooped down and Heracles declared this to be a sign that his prayer had been heard. Almost immediately thereafter Periboea was delivered of Telamonian Ajax. Telamon accompanied Heracles on his voyage against Troy and was the first to break through the wall and enter the city. Heracles was instantly enraged that Telamon had exceeded him in bravery and prepared to strike Telamon dead. But Telamon realized that he had aroused Heracles' wrath by his impetuous valor. With great presence of mind he began to collect stones. Heracles paused in the act of hurling his spear at Telamon to ask what he was doing. The quick-witted Telamon answered that he was building an altar to Heracles the Victor. Heracles was mollified and the attack proceeded. In the capture of Troy by Heracles, Telamon was awarded Hesione, a daughter of Laomedon and the sister of Priam. He took her back to Greece and she bore him Teucer, a noted archer. Priam sought repeatedly for the restoration of his sister but was denied satisfaction each time. Partly on this account Priam later felt completely justified in refusing to restore Helen to Menelaus after she had been abducted by Paris. Both of Telamon's sons took a valiant part in the second war against Troy, for the recapture of Helen. Thus the oracle which prophesied that the descendants of Aeacus would twice take Troy was fulfilled. Apollo had proclaimed this oracle at the time when the walls of Troy were built by him and Poseidon, with the help of the mortal Aeacus. At the end of the Trojan War Teucer returned to Salamis with the news that Ajax had committed suicide. Telamon banished him, even as he had been banished in his youth, claiming that he had not protected his brother's interests and blaming Teucer because he had not prevented his brother's death. Telamon took part in the Calydonian Hunt. He accompanied Jason and the Argonauts on the expedition to Colchis in quest of the Golden Fleece. He was a friend of Heracles and went with him to Thermopylae when Heracles went there to fetch the girdle of the Amazon queen.

Telamon. In ancient geography, a place on the coast of Etruria, Italy, about 76 miles NW of Rome. Near here the Romans nearly annihilated (225 B.C.) an army of Gauls.

Telchines (tel-kī'nēz). In Greek mythology, nine children of the Sea (Thalassa). According to some accounts they had dogs' heads and flippers for hands. They were the first inhabitants of Rhodes and founded the cities of Lindus, Camirus, and Ialysus, which they named for three of the Danaids. With Caphira, a daughter of Oceanus, they nurtured the infant Poseidon who had been entrusted to them by Rhea, and made his trident. Later he fell in love with one of their number, Halia, and by her became the father of six sons and one daughter. The Telchines were renowned as smiths, and made the sickle with which Cronus castrated his father Uranus. They possessed the evil eye, could change their shape at will, could summon rain, clouds, snow, and hail, and were the first to make images of the gods. Zeus wanted to destroy them because of their magic powers and because of the unhealthy mists they caused, but Artemis warned them and they fled. Those who settled in Boeotia were destroyed in a flood. Those who went to Lycia were destroyed by Apollo.

Teledamas (tē-led'a-mas). According to some accounts, one of the twin sons Cassandra bore to Agamemnon. He and his brother Pelops were murdered in their infancy by Aegisthus and his followers at Mycenae. His tomb was near his mother's at Mycenae.

Telegonia/Telephassa

Telegonia (tel-ē-gō'ni-ā). [Also: Lay of Telegonus.] Cyclic poem by Eugammon of Cyrene (c566 B.C.). It was a continuation of the Odyssey, and was named from its hero Telegonus, son of Odysseus and Circe, who slew his father and married Penelope. The poem completed the Trojan Cycle.

Telegonus (tē-leg'ō-nus). In Greek legend, a son of Circe and Odysseus, born when Odysseus, on his way home from the Trojan War, stopped and lingered some time with Circe. Years later Circe sent Telegonus to find his father. He landed on the shores of Ithaca, under the impression that it was Corcyra, and set about to raid the island. Odysseus came to repel the invader. Each was ignorant of the other's identity and in the struggle Telegonus came face to face with Odysseus and killed him with his spear, which was tipped with the spine of a sting ray. Thus the prophecy which Tiresias had made to Odysseus in the Underworld—that his death would come from the sea—was fulfilled. Telegonus returned to Circe's isle with Telemachus and Penelope, and married Penelope. He was said to have been the founder of Tusculum and Praeneste in Latium, according to some accounts. Circe made Telegonus and Penelope immortal and they eventually went to dwell in the Isles of the Blest.

Telegonus. In Greek mythology, a son of Proteus. He married Io when she at last reached the Nile after her long wanderings and had been restored to her own form by Zeus. He was killed by Heracles, whom he had challenged to a wrestling match as the latter returned from his expedition to fetch Hippolyte's girdle.

Telemachus (tē-lem'ā-kus). In Greek legend, a son of Odysseus and Penelope. While he was still an infant, his father left Ithaca to go to the Trojan War. In the long absence of Odysseus Telemachus grew up. Although he was manly, straightforward, and intelligent, he was not able to exercise authority over the numerous suitors who came to woo his mother and who wasted the property of his father in eating and drinking at his expense. In the twentieth year of Odysseus' absence Athena appeared to Telemachus in the form of Mentès, a captain of the Taphians, and encouraged him to call a council of the Ithacans to ask the wooers to go home. The suitors refused to leave and mocked the youthful Telemachus. Athena advised him to seek information about Odysseus. She provided a ship for him in which he sailed to Pylus to question Nestor. Nestor sent him on to Menelaus in Sparta. In neither place did he hear any recent news of his father and Athena again appeared to him and told him to go home. She warned him that his mother's suitors were lying in wait to kill him, told him how to avoid them, and instructed him to go to the house of the faithful swineherd Eumaeus. Telemachus followed her instructions. At the house of Eumaeus he was reunited with his father, who had at last landed in his own country and had gone to Eumaeus, to whom he appeared in the guise of a beggar. Together, Odysseus and Telemachus planned to expel the suitors. They went to the palace of Odysseus and in due course attacked and killed the arrogant suitors. After Odysseus was reunited with Penelope and resumed control of his estates, he learned from an oracle that he would meet his death at the hands of his son. Thinking that this meant Telemachus, he banished him to the island of Cephallenia. But it was another son, Telegonus, who caused the death of Odysseus. Unaware of his father's identity, Telegonus, the son of Circe and Odysseus, landed on the shores of Ithaca and killed Odysseus. When he realized he had killed his father, he took the body of Odysseus back to the land of Circe. Telemachus and Peneopole went with him. Circe made them all immortal and married Telemachus.

Telemus (tē'le-mus). In Greek mythology, a noted seer who journeyed to Sicily and there encountered Polyphemus the Cyclops. He warned Polyphemus that his single eye in the middle of his forehead would one day be gouged out by Odysseus. Polyphemus laughed at the prophecy. He remembered it only after Odysseus, having blinded him, was sailing safely away.

Telephassa (tel-e-fas'ā). In Greek mythology, the wife of Agenor and the mother of Cadmus, Cilix, Phineus, Phoenix, Thasus, and Europa. She went with her son

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr, Cadmus to Rhodes and from there to Thrace, where she died. She is sometimes also called Argiope.

Telephus (tel'e-fus). In Greek legend, a son of Heracles and Auge, a priestess of Athena. He was abandoned on Mount Parthenius by his mother but was nursed by a doe and found by herdsmen who took him to King Corythus. On reaching manhood he was told by the oracle of Delphi to sail to Mysia for news of his parents. There he learned from King Teuthras, now married to his mother, of his parentage. He married Teuthras' daughter, Argiope, and later became king of Mysia. According to other accounts, Telephus, speechless, went to Mysia accompanied by Parthenopaeus, son of Atalanta, who acted as his spokesman. In Mysia he defeated the enemies of Teuthras and was rewarded by being given Auge, the king's adopted daughter, as his wife. On the wedding night Auge attempted to kill him, as she was faithful to Heracles, but a serpent slithered into the room and prevented it. Thereupon Auge cried out to the spirit of Heracles, and Telephus was miraculously informed that she was his mother and Heracles was his father. In the early years of the Trojan War the Greeks landed in Mysia and ravaged it under the impression that it was part of the Troad. Telephus had driven them back to their ships when Achilles and Patroclus appeared. He turned to run from them but tripped on a vine and was wounded by Achilles' spear. The Greeks then sailed away. Telephus' wound did not heal. He was told by Apollo that only he who caused it could cure it. Having gone in disguise to Mycenae, at Clytemnestra's suggestion he snatched up the infant Orestes and told Agamemnon he would kill the child unless he healed his wound. Because there was a prophecy that the Greeks could not take Troy without the aid of Telephus, Agamemnon sent for Achilles, who cured the wound by scraping rust from his spear onto it. Telephus had agreed to pilot the Greeks to Troy but afterward refused to carry out his promise, claiming that his wife was Priam's daughter. However, he charted the course that the Greeks successfully followed to get to Troy.

Telesilla (tel-e-sil'a). Lyric poetess of Argos at the end of the 6th century B.C. It was said that she became a poetess because, when she consulted the oracle about her health, she was told she would find health with the Muses. She was renowned for her poetry—hymns to Artemis and Apollo—only small fragments of which remain. Cleomenes, the Spartan king (c519–c487 B.C.), attacked the Argives and they fled for refuge to a grove sacred to Argus. Cleomenes set fire to the grove and burned them to death. Argos now being undefended, Cleomenes marched against the city. Telesilla rallied the women; they armed themselves and defended the walls with great valor. The Spartans were dismayed, for if they defeated the women it would be a victory without honor. If, on the other hand, the women defeated them, it would be a devastating disgrace. Faced with the dilemma, the Spartans withdrew. Some say this was a fulfillment of the oracle that:

Time shall be when the female shall conquer the male, and shall chase him Far away, gaining so great praise and honor in Argos

The statue of Telesilla before the sanctuary of Aphrodite at Argos represented her with her books lying at her feet, and in her hands was a helmet she was in the act of placing on her head.

Telesphorus (te-les'fôr-us). A deity attendant on Asclepius, who appeared in dreams and healed the sick or wounded. In ancient art he is represented as a child, often with Asclepius.

Telesterion (te-les-ter'i-on). A hall of initiation (telesthenai "to be initiated"), where the rites and ceremonies of admission to membership in the mystery religions were performed; especially, that at Eleusis near Athens. The Telesterion at Eleusis, at first a shrine of modest dimensions, was several times rebuilt on a larger scale. In its final 5th-century B.C. form it was a large building, square in plan, enclosing an area of about 29,000 square feet, with a Doric portico of 12 columns, and six entrances. The roof was supported by seven rows of six columns, like the hypostyle halls of Egypt, and along the four walls were eight rows of narrow stone seats. A religious drama or pageant based on the myth of Demeter was performed in this hall for the candidates for initiation. The initiates were forbidden to reveal the details of the ceremony, and the secret was kept so well that modern scholarship has not penetrated it. However, there are hints that the ceremony told of the rape by Hades of Demeter's daughter Persephone, Demeter's search, her kindly reception at Eleusis, and her gift of agriculture. (JJ)

Teleus (te-lē'us). Epithet of Zeus. The altar of Zeus Teleus (Full-grown) at Tegea had an image that was square, like the Hermae.

Tellus (tel'us). The Roman equivalent of the Greek earth-goddess Gaea. When her temple was dedicated in Rome in 286 B.C. an earthquake occurred. Because of this she was especially invoked during earthquakes. She was also a goddess by whom oaths were sworn. Tellus was worshiped as a goddess of marriage, and especially as a goddess of the fruitfulness of fields and cattle. Festivals were held in her honor to ensure fruitful harvests from the sowing of seeds and fertility among the cattle. Her worship included fertility sacrifices, such as a cow with an unborn calf. The ashes of the calf were kept by the vestal virgins and afterward used in rites of purification. Like many other earth deities, she was also associated with rites for the dead.

Telmessus (tel-mes'us). In ancient geography, a town on the coast of Lycia, Asia Minor. The town was noted for its oracle of Apollo. Croesus, withdrawing to Sardis after an indecisive engagement with Cyrus, found that the outskirts of Sardis were swarming with snakes. The horses left the pastures and went to feed on the snakes. Croesus sent to the soothsayers of Telmessus to learn the meaning of this strange portent. The Telmessians sent word that the prodigy meant that foreign invaders would come and subdue his people, for the serpent, they said, is a child of earth, and the horse is a warrior and an alien. But by the time the message from the Telmessian soothsayers arrived, Croesus had already been captured by Cyrus and the Persians were plundering his capital. Among the important antiquities on the site of the ancient town is an ancient theater, well preserved and of good style.

Telphusa (tel-fū'sa). In Greek mythology, a nymph of a spring in Boeotia. According to some accounts, she persuaded Apollo not to erect a temple and oracle at her spring but advised him to go to Delphi where, since she was a prophetess, she knew he would have to overcome the Python. Apollo punished her by hiding her spring under rocks near which he built an altar.

Temenos (tem'e-nos). In Greek antiquity, a sacred enclosure or precinct; a piece of land marked off from common uses and dedicated to a god; a precinct, usually surrounded by a barrier, allotted to a temple or sanctuary, or consecrated for any reason.

Temenus (tem'e-nus). In Greek legend, a son of Aristomachus, a descendant of Heracles, and brother of Cresphontes and Aristodemus. With his brothers, he proposed to invade the Peloponnesus and win the land that they said had been left in trust for them by their ancestor Heracles. When a fleet and army were assembled at Naupactus, an Acarnanian seer came to them, chanting prophetic verses. The Heraclidae (descendants of Heracles) feared he was a magician sent by the Peloponnesians to destroy them and so they slew him. After this Aristodemus, some say, was killed by a bolt of lightning, the fleet was destroyed, and the army had to be disbanded because of famine. Temenus consulted the oracle and learned that these calamities had come to punish them for the death of the seer. Temenus and his relatives were instructed to banish the slayer for ten years and to take "the Three-eyed One" for a guide. Obeying the oracle, the slayer was banished. Temenus, with Cresphontes, Eurysthenes and Procles (twin sons of the dead Aristodemus), looked about for "the Three-eyed One." They met Oxylus, an exile from Aetolia, driving a one-eyed mule, decided he was "the Three-eyed One," and took him as their guide. He led them to Elis and they conquered the Peloponnesus. Oxylus received Elis as his reward. The brothers and their nephews decided to divide the rest of the Peloponnesus between them by lot. They were to cast their lots into an urn and he whose lot came up first was to receive Argos, second Laconia, and third Messenia. The lot of Temenus came up first and he was assigned Argos. The sons of Aristodemus won dominion over Laconia. Cresphontes, who greatly desired the rich land of Messenia, won it by a trick. He put a clod of earth into the urn and poured water on it. As it was melted by the water, his lot came up last. After the lot-drawing, the Heraclidae set up three altars to Zeus Patrous (Paternal) and on the altar of each a sign appeared. On the altar of Temenus there was a toad. The seer interpreted this to mean that his people must stay in the city, for the toad loses its strength when it walks. Temenus was the father of three sons, Agelaus, Eurypylus, and Callias, and one daughter, Hyrnetho. He favored his daughter and her husband, Deiphontes, and proposed to leave his kingdom to them. When his sons learned of this they hired assassins to kill him as he bathed in the river. Nevertheless, though mortally wounded, he managed to pass on his kingdom to his daughter before he expired. It was to this Temenus that the Temenidae, who later colonized Macedonia, traced their ancestry.

Temenus. According to Greek tradition, a son of Pelasgus who, according to some accounts, brought up Hera in Arcadia. At Stymphalus he raised three shrines in honor of Hera. In the first she was worshiped as a child because he had brought her up; in the second she was worshiped as a bride to commemorate her marriage to Zeus; and in the third as a widow because she had left Zeus and had come to live at Stymphalus.

Tempe (tem'pē), Vale of. Valley in E. Thessaly, Greece, deeply cleft between Olympus on the N and Ossa on the S, and traversed by the Peneus (or Salambria) River. It has been celebrated from ancient times for its beauty and savage grandeur. Tempe was one of the chief seats of the cult of Apollo. Some say the god went there after slaying the Python at Delphi and purified himself by bathing in the waters of the Peneus. Daphne, daughter of the river-god Peneus, was one of Apollo's earliest loves. She fled his embraces and was transformed into a laurel tree. Henceforth a delegation from Delphi went every eight years to Tempe to fetch laurel for the Pythian Games at Delphi. Length, about five miles.

Tempestates (tem-pes-tā'tēz). In Roman mythology, goddesses of the winds and storms. Sacrifices of black female lambs were offered to them, and shrines were erected for them, in order to gain safety in sea voyages.

Tencteri (teng'k'te-rī). Ancient Germanic tribe first mentioned by Caesar, who describes them as having been driven by the Suevi (59 B.C.), together with the Usipetes, out of their original home. The Tencteri were defeated by Caesar in 55 B.C. in Gallic territory near the confluence of the Mosa (Maas) with the Rhenus (Rhine). They afterward joined other tribes in wars against Rome, and were probably merged ultimately with the Alamanni. According to Tacitus in Germania, they excelled in horsemanship.

Tenea (ten'ē-ā). In ancient geography, a town in the region of Corinth. The inhabitants claimed to be Trojans who were taken prisoner by Agamemnon on the island of Tenedos and afterward allowed to settle in Greece. They worshiped Apollo, said by some to be the father of Tenes, above all other gods.

Tenedos (ten'ē-dos). A small island in the Aegean Sea situated off the Troad, on the NW coast of Asia Minor. It was known in the legends of the Trojans as an island sacred to Apollo, and was named for Tenes, a son of Apollo. The Greeks landed in Tenedos on their way to Troy, killed Tenes, and ravaged the island. It was to this island that the Greeks withdrew when they left the Wooden Horse on the beach at Troy to delude the Trojans into the belief that they had sailed for home. Historically, the island was settled by Aeolians, was subjugated by the Persians, and was in alliance with Athens in the 5th century B.C. Length, about seven miles.

Tenes (ten'es). In Greek legend, a son of Apollo, or as some say, of Cycnus, and Proclea. His stepmother Phylonome fell in love with him but he honorably rejected her amorous advances. She then denounced him to Cycnus, accused him of seeking to ravish her, and called Eumolpus, a flute-player, as her witness. Cycnus believed her, and to punish Tenes, he put him and his sister Hemitheia in a chest and set them adrift on the sea. The chest went aground on an island near the coast of Asia Minor. Tenes became king of the island and named it Tenedos after himself. Cycnus later learned that Tenes had been blameless in the affair with Phylonome. He had the flute-player who had born false witness stoned to death, and buried Phylonome alive. Cycnus then sailed to Tenedos to ask forgiveness of his son. Tenes at first refused to allow him to moor his ship in the waters of Tenedos. Afterward, however, he forgave his father and Cycnus settled near him on Tenedos. When the Greeks sailed from Aulis the second time on their way to Troy, they coasted by Tenedos and sought to land. Tenes tried to prevent them from landing by hurling rocks at them from a cliff. Achilles swam ashore and killed Tenes. The Greeks landed and ravaged the island. But some say the Greeks were allowed to land peaceably but that Achilles seduced Hemi-thea, sister of Tenes, and in the resulting quarrel killed Tenes. In killing Tenes Achilles had carelessly forgotten his mother's warning that if he killed a son of Apollo, he would die by Apollo's hand. Thetis, mother of Achilles, had even sent a servant, Mnemon, whose sole duty was to remind Achilles not to slay a son of Apollo. When Achilles realized that he had forgotten his mother's warning, he killed Mnemon for failing in his duty. Tenes was buried on Tenedos and a shrine was erected to him. He was worshiped as a god after his death. No flute-player could enter the sacred precincts of his shrine because a flute-player had borne false witness against him, and it was forbidden to utter the name Achilles in these precincts.

Tenos (tē'nos). [Also: Tino, Tinos.] An island of the Cyclades, SE of Greece. Here, according to legend, Heracles slew the Boreadae as they were returning from funeral games for Pelias. He killed them because they, on the voyage of the Argo, had persuaded the Argonauts not to wait while Heracles searched for his lost squire Hylas in Mysia. Thus Heracles was left behind. Over their burial mound in Tenos Heracles erected two columns, one of which sways at the breath of the North Wind (Boreas). In modern times the island is one of the most prosperous of the Greek islands, and exports marble and wine. Length, about 17 miles; area, 79 square miles.

Tenth Muse. See Sappho.

Tentyra (ten'ti-rā). [Also: Tentyris; modern names, Dendera, Denderah.] Town in Upper Egypt, situated on the Nile. It is celebrated for its temple of the cow-goddess Hathor, which notwithstanding its late date, begun by Ptolemy XII (Ptolemy Auletes), and the great pronaos (columned hall outside the temple proper) added as late as the time of Tiberius, is one of the most interesting buildings in Egypt, owing to its almost perfect preservation, even to the roof. The imposing hexastyle pronaos has four ranges of Hathoric columns; on its ceiling is a noted sculptured zodiac, combining Egyptian and classical elements. Next to the pronaos is a hypostyle hall (ceiling supported on columns) of six columns, from which three chambers open on each side, and beyond this is a vestibule before a large hall in which stands an isolated cella. This hall is surrounded by a series of chambers, one of which in the middle of the back wall contained the emblematic sistrum (an instrument in the form of a metal rattle) of the goddess. The whole interior surface is sculptured, the art, however, being inferior. On the roof there is a small six-chambered temple to the local divinity Osiris-An.

Teos (tē'os). In ancient geography, one of the 12 Ionian cities of Asia Minor, situated on the W coast, about 25 miles SW of Smyrna. According to tradition, it was first inhabited by Minyans from Orchomenus who went there with Athamas, descendant of that Athamas who was the son of Aeolus. They were later joined by Ionians, Athenians, and Boeotians. The Teians fell under the dominion of the kings of Lydia. When Croesus was attacked by Cyrus, the Ionian cities rejected the overtures of Cyrus, thinking he could not defeat Croesus, and when Cyrus conquered Croesus he set out to bring the Ionian cities under his sway. All, except Miletus, resisted. Harpagus, general of Cyrus, approached Teos and prepared to take the walled city by building a mound of earth up around the wall. The Teians, rather than submit to slavery under the

Persians, abandoned their city. They embarked all the inhabitants in their ships and sailed off to Thrace, where they founded Abdera. Among the ruins at Teos is a noted temple of Dionysus, a beautiful Ionic hexastyle peripteros on a stylobate of three steps.

Terence (ter'ens). [Full Latin name, Publius Terentius Afer.] Roman comic poet; born at Carthage, c195 B.C.; died c159 B.C. He went early to Rome as a slave of Publius Terentius Lucanus, and was soon liberated, thereupon taking his patron's name. He became a friend of the younger Scipio and of Laelius, and went to Greece after bringing out his plays. The material of his works was rather freely adapted from the Greek playwrights Menander and Apollodorus. He left six comedies: Andria, Hecyra, Heautontimorumenos, Eunuchus, Phormio, and Adelphi.

Terentia (tē-ren'shi-ā). First wife of Cicero, to whom she bore a son and a daughter. He divorced her in 46 B.C.

Tereus (tē'rös). In mythology, a king of Thrace, who went to the aid of Pandion, king of Athens, when the latter was beset by enemies. Pandion showed his appreciation by giving Tereus his daughter Procne in marriage. Tereus was transformed into a hoopoe for the outrage he committed on Philomela, the sister of Procne. See Procne.

Terminalia (tēr-mi-nā'li-ā). Ancient Roman festival celebrated annually in honor of Terminus, the god of boundaries. It was held on the 23rd of February, its essential feature being a survey of boundaries.

Termini Imerese (ter'mē-nē ē-mā-rā'sā). See Thermae Himeraeae.

Terminus (tēr'mi-nus). In Roman mythology, the god who presided over boundaries and landmarks. He was represented with a human head, but without feet or arms, so intimate that he never moved from whatever place he occupied. He was given a place in the temple of Jupiter, and for this reason is sometimes interpreted as an aspect of Jupiter.

Terpander (tēr-pan'dēr). Greek musician and poet; born at Antissa, Lesbos, Greece; fl. mid-7th century B.C. He was undoubtedly a historical person, but very little is known about him, and some of what is told is probably legend rather than fact. He is said to have won the prize in musical contests at Delphi four times and to have won the laurel for music at the Carnean Games in 676 B.C. According to some accounts, he was summoned to Sparta c650 B.C., in conformity with a revelation by the oracle at Delphi, to bring about peace between contending groups in that city-state, to lead the Spartan choruses in the religious festivals, and to teach the Spartans his new musical system. Henceforward the Spartans followed Terpander's style and did not look with favor on any deviation from it. He has been called the father both of Greek classical music and of lyric poetry, and it seems certain that he was in fact a poet, a composer, and a player of stringed instruments. Strabo wrote that to the four strings which the lyre formerly had Terpander added three more; but others understand that his innovation was in the form of the nome, or ode recited to music, which he divided into seven parts, where previously there were four. Terpander has in fact been credited with the origination of musical notation, but this is considered very doubtful. He was, in any case, the earliest Greek musician of whom we have even fragmentary historical knowledge.

Terpsichore (tērp-sik'ō-rē). One of the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne. She is the muse of the dance, the patroness of lyric poetry, the choral dance, and the dramatic chorus developed from it. In the last days of the Greek religion her province was restricted to lyric poetry. In art she is usually represented as bearing a lyre. According to some accounts, Terpsichore was the mother of the Sirens. See Muses.

Terracina (ter-rā-chē'nā). See Tarracina.

Terra Mater (ter'ā mā'tēr). [Also: Terra.] In Roman mythology, a goddess, the personification of the earth. She is the same as Tellus. Latin writers also referred to the Germanic earth goddess, Nerthus, as Terra Mater.

Terra Sigillata (ter'ā sij-i-lā'tā). Term used to denote a type of Hellenistic pottery, decorated in molded reliefs in imitation of embossed metal ware, used principally for bowls and plates for table service. The peak of the art was achieved at Arretium in Etruria, whose potters in the 1st century B.C. perfected a ware with a biscuit of high quality, delicate designs, and a distinctive bright red glaze, thanks to which Arretine Ware became widely popular and was imitated in S Gaul and eventually in N Gaul, Germany, Pannonia, and even Britain, where it was formerly known as Samian Ware. Vessels of Arretine origin are often stamped with the name of the maker, study of which has enabled scholars to reconstruct the organization of the workshops. (JJ)

Testaceus (tes-tā-sē'us), Mons. [Modern name, Monte Testaccio.] Hill in the S part of Rome, SW of the Aventine Hill, on the left bank of the Tiber. It is about 115 feet in height above the surrounding area, and 2500 feet in circumference, and is formed entirely of the fragments of pottery vases, chiefly amphorae, from the extensive warehouses which once lined the neighboring quay. The potters' stamps on the fragments show that this rubbish heap was still used in the 4th century A.D., and it is believed to have been begun about the inception of the empire.

Tethys (tē'this). In Greek mythology, a Titaness, the daughter of Gaea and Uranus. She was "the lovely queen of the sea," the wife of Oceanus, and the mother of all the rivers and 3000 Oceanids.

Teucer (tū'sér). In Greek legend, a son of the Cretan prince Scamander and the nymph Ideaea. He was born in Phrygia, whither Scamander had come to escape a famine in Crete. Teucer succeeded his father and became the first king of Troy, for which reason the Trojans are sometimes called Teucrians. According to some accounts, Aeneas and his companions were told to seek the home of their ancestors after they fled from Troy. Thinking the oracle referred to Scamander, or Teucer, they mistakenly went to Crete. Teucer's daughter Batia married Dardanus, a Thracian prince, who succeeded to the throne on Teucer's death. But some say it was Teucer who emigrated to Phrygia from Crete, and that he found Dardanus there and was welcomed by him. Still others say Teucer emigrated from Attica, founded Troy, and received Dardanus when he landed in Phrygia.

Teucer. In Greek legend, a bastard son of Telamon and Hesione, and adoring half-brother of Telamonian Ajax. He was a master of archery. He had been one of Helen's suitors before she married Menelaus, and as such was compelled to live up to his oath to aid Menelaus in any difficulty arising from his marriage. Therefore he joined the Greeks who went to Troy to recapture Helen. In the war he fought bravely at Ajax' side, at times using his brother's shield as a protection. He darted out from behind the enormous shield carried by Ajax, shot his lethal arrow, and then retired behind the shield. With his arrows he killed many, and tried several times to kill Hector. The first time, he struck Gorgythion instead; the second time, Apollo deflected his arrow and he killed Archeptolemus, Hector's charioteer. On his third try, Hector wounded him by hurling a great stone that struck him in the shoulder just as he was about to shoot. When he fell, Ajax again protected him with his shield. He wounded Glaucus, Sarpedon's comrade, when the Trojans breached the Greek wall, and assailed Sarpedon himself, but Zeus protected the latter. Again, Zeus caused his bowstring to snap as he once more aimed at Hector. The death of Ajax by suicide caused him bitter grief. As he stood over his fallen body, he recognized the sword Ajax had used to kill himself as the one Hector had given him, and recalled that Hector had been tied to the back of Achilles' chariot by the girdle Ajax had given him. He defied Menelaus' order not to bury Ajax, and with the wife and young son of Ajax as witnesses, buried him in the sands of Troy. When he returned to Salamis, Telamon forbade him to land and banished him because he had not brought back Ajax' bones, nor his wife, nor his son. He then went to Sidon, where he was hospitably received by Belus, father of Dido, and got help from him to conquer Cyprus. He married the daughter of the king who had given the island his name, built a city there which he named Salamis after his home in Greece, became king of Cyprus, and founded a dynasty of kings which traced their descent from him.

Teucrians (tū'kri-anz). Another name for the Trojans, from their ancestor Teucer.

Teumessus (tū-mes'us). In ancient geography, a place near Thebes in Boeotia, which was the home of the Teumessian vixen, a fox that, by an edict of the gods, could not be caught.

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

The vixen ravaged the countryside and at last Amphitryon set Laelaps, a dog fated to catch whatever it pursued, to chase the vixen. Under these circumstances, Zeus turned both animals to stone. Teumessus was also named as a place where Europa was hidden by Zeus. A sanctuary of Telchian Athena at Teumessus was said by some to have been raised by Telchines from Cyprus.

Teuthis (tū'this). [Also, known as Ornytus.] In Greek legend, a leader of Arcadians from the village of Teuthis. When the Greeks were windbound at Aulis, Teuthis quarreled with Agamemnon and threatened to withdraw with his Arcadians. Athena came to persuade him not to withdraw, but he was so angry he struck the goddess with his spear and wounded her in the thigh. Teuthis then led his army back to Arcadia. Once at home, he was struck by a wasting disease and famine fell on his village, alone of the Arcadian villages. The oracle of Dodona told the inhabitants how they might appease the goddess. In addition, they made an image of Athena, showing the wound in her thigh, and dedicated it in the temple. The image, with its thigh wrapped in a purple bandage, was seen by the traveler Pausanias in the 2nd century A.D.

Teuthrania (tū-thrā'ni-ā). In ancient geography, a region of Mysia, Asia Minor.

Teuthras (tū'thras). In Greek legend, a king in Mysia. Once while hunting, he raised a great boar and pursued it. The boar fled to the temple of Artemis and as Teuthras overtook it there, it cried out in a human voice to be spared as one of Artemis' creatures. Teuthras ignored the plea for mercy and ruthlessly killed it. This so enraged Artemis that she restored the boar to life and punished Teuthras with madness and disease. His mother at length appeased Artemis with rich sacrifices and Teuthras was cleansed of his disease and purified of his madness. This Teuthras gave refuge to Auge when she fled to his kingdom. According to some accounts, he married Auge. When her son Telephus later arrived in Mysia in search of news of his parents, Teuthras welcomed him. Telephus helped Teuthras to rout his enemies, and as a reward was given the daughter of Teuthras for a wife and made heir to his kingdom. Others say Teuthras adopted Auge as his daughter when she fled to him, and that when Telephus appeared, Teuthras offered him Auge in return for his aid in driving off his enemies. But on the wedding night the relationship between Auge and Telephus was revealed and Teuthras, learning of it, sent them both back to their homeland with his blessing.

Teuthras. A legendary king of Phrygia and the father of Tecmessa. He was slain by Telamonian Ajax, and his daughter was taken captive by Ajax.

Teuthras. In the Iliad, a Magnesian ally of the Greeks. He was slain by Hector when Ares took part in the fight to help the Trojans.

Teutobod (tū'tō-bod). King of the Teutones, defeated by Marius at the battle of Aquae Sextiae (modern Aix), 102 B.C.

Teutoberg (tū'tō-bérg) Forest. [German, Teutoburger Wald or Teutoburgerwald.] Low, wooded mountain range in NW Germany, extending from the vicinity of Osnabrück in Hanover SE through North Rhine-Westphalia. It is known in different parts as the Lippischer Wald, Osning, and by other names. A victory was gained in this area (exact locality undetermined) in 9 A.D. by the Germans under Arminius (Hermann) over the Romans under Varus, the Roman army being nearly annihilated. Peak elevation, about 1535 feet.

Teutones (tū'tō-nēz). [Also: Teutoni.] Ancient Germanic people which, with the Cimbri, defeated three Roman armies in the years 109-105 B.C., and were nearly destroyed by Caius Marius at Aquae Sextiae (Aix), 102 B.C. The Teutones are mentioned later as dwelling near the lower Albis (Elbe) River and eastward.

Thais (thā'is). Athenian courtesan; fl. in the last part of the 4th century B.C. She was the mistress of Alexander the Great, whom she accompanied on his expedition into Asia. She is alleged (undoubtedly erroneously) to have incited him to set fire to Persepolis. After the death of Alexander she became the mistress of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, and bore him two sons.

Thalamae (thal'ā-mē). In ancient geography, a place on the promontory of Taenarum in Laconia, where there was an oracle of Pasiphaë, which, in this case, was a title of the moon. This oracle was consulted during sleep and responses were given in dreams. Nearby, at Pephus, there was a large rock in the sea which was said to have been the birthplace of the Dioscuri and from which Hermes carried them off to be reared at Pellana. The Laconians placed on the rock small bronze images of the Dioscuri, which were so fashioned as not to be moved even though the sea washed over them.

Thalassa (tha-las'a) or Thalatta (-lat'a). In later Greek mythology, the personification of the sea. She was a goddess of the sea who was sometimes thought of as the mother of Aphrodite by Zeus, but this was not the traditional version of the origin of Aphrodite. In other accounts she was the wife of Pontus and the mother by him of fish children. Again, she was said to be the mother of the Telchines.

Thales (tha'lez) or Thaletas (tha-le'tas). Lyric poet and musician of Sparta; born in Crete; fl. about the 7th century B.C.

Thales. Greek philosopher, astronomer, and geometer; born at Miletus, Asia Minor, c640 B.C.; died c546 B.C. He was one of the seven wise men of ancient Greece, the earliest of the Ionian natural philosophers, and has been called the father of European science and philosophy. He stands at the historical point where myths and cosmogonies no longer satisfied man's curiosity concerning the origin of the world. Thales sought an original substance from which all things arise, and believed that substance to be water. His interest in the nature of the universe led him to various studies, and to him are attributed various discoveries in geometry and astronomy. He is said to have learned, for example, that a circle is bisected by its diameter, and to have found that the height of a pyramid could be determined by measuring its shadow at an hour of the day when a man's shadow was the same length as a man. On May 28, 585 B.C., the Medes and the Lydians were engaged in a battle, in the course of a war that had been going on intermittently for six years. In the midst of the battle the sun was darkened and day became night. The combatants, terrified by this sign from heaven, laid down their arms and concluded a peace. "This event," says Herodotus, "had been foretold by Thales, the Milesian, who forewarned the Ionians of it, fixing for it the very year in which it actually took place." His correct prediction of the eclipse of the sun spread Thales' fame among the ancients. When Cyrus was engaged in the conquest of the Ionian cities, according to Herodotus, Thales advised them to unite in one political unit, with a capital on the island of Teos, to defend themselves. His advice, based on the weakness their disunity caused and the evident intention of Cyrus to pick them off one by one, was not taken. His reputation as an abstract philosopher, it is said, brought the criticism that he was impractical; according to the story, he then went into the olive-oil business and made a fortune. He is memorable, not only for his actual discoveries, but for being the first to base a philosophy on natural phenomena alone without recourse to the supernatural.

Thalia (tha-li'a). One of the nine daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, she is the muse of comedy. By Apollo, according to some accounts, Thalia was the mother of the Corybantes. In later art she is generally represented with a comic mask, a shepherd's crook, and a wreath of ivy. See Muses.

Thallo (thal'o). In Greek mythology, the Attic name of one of the Horae, whose names as fertility spirits vary locally. Thallo presided over the growth of vegetation.

Thamus (tha'mus). An Egyptian sailor who, according to tradition, was in a ship bound for Italy when he heard a shout across the water. A voice called his name and told him when he reached Italy to proclaim that "the great god Pan is dead." Thamus did as he was bid and all the people mourned.

Thamyris (tham'i-ris). A legendary Thracian poet and musician who fell in love with the handsome youth Hyacinthus. Apollo was his rival for the affections of Hyacinthus, and when he overheard Thamyris boast that he could vie with the Muses in singing, he reported this boast to the Muses. They pursued Thamyris and overtook him at Dorium. To punish him for his boasting they blinded him, took away his voice, and caused him to forget his skill on the lyre.

Thanatos (than'a-tos). Ancient Greek personification of death. He was not worshiped as a god. In ancient Greece as elsewhere in the world, death personified was a folk concept. Later he became prominent in literary allusion. He was regarded as a healer and remover of pain; he was inexorable in his purpose, and unbribable. Hesiod said he was even hated by the gods. In the Iliad he is the son of Nyx (Night) and the brother of Hypnos (Sleep).

Thapsacus (thap'sa-kus). [In the Bible, Tiph-sah; modern village, Dibse.] In ancient geography, a town in Syria on the W bank of the Euphrates. It was an important crossing place in ancient times. Here Xenophon crossed when he accompanied the expedition of Cyrus the Younger; and here also Alexander the Great crossed the Euphrates.

Thapsus (thap'sus). In ancient geography, a town in N Africa, situated on the coast about 30 miles SE of what is now Sousse. Here Julius Caesar totally defeated (46 B.C.) the remnants of the army of Pompey that had been reorganized under Cato, Scipio, and Juba, and ended the African phase of the civil war. It is said that Caesar's forces were in a near panic when they learned of the size of the army Juba was leading against them. Caesar's psychology for encouraging his men was to exaggerate the size of the enemy's forces, giving exact figures, as he claimed, to keep them from spreading rumors, and also to spur them to fight for their lives before an overwhelming force. Any who doubted their ability to win or the facts he had given them were invited to embark on a leaking ship and put to sea where they would be the plaything of the winds. As noted above, this psychological approach was effective.

Thargelia (thär-jē'li-a). Ancient Greek festival celebrated in honor of Apollo at Athens, on the 6th and 7th of the month Thargelion, the month in which Apollo was born and which was sacred to him. (Thargelion was equivalent to the last of May and the beginning of June.). In the festival certain purification ceremonies were enacted and offerings of the first fruits of the harvest, raw fruits and bread from the first grain, were made to the god. On the first day of the festival the city was cleansed of any pollution that might be in it. Two men, usually condemned criminals, were led out of the city. One of them, wearing black figs about his neck, represented the men of the city; the other, who wore white figs, represented the women. These men were called pharmacoi, and in them was embodied any evil that might have resided in the city. To them all such evil was transferred; they were the magical means by which the city was cleansed; they were scapegoats. The pharmacoi were driven forth to the piping of flutes and beaten with branches of fig trees and with leeks. The fig branches were strong and would thoroughly scourge the evil clinging to the pharmacoi. The leek was a powerful purgative. According to some accounts, the pharmacoi were in early times stoned to death, and burned in fires made of the wood of wild trees, and their ashes were scattered on the seashore. Thus the evil attached to them was also scattered and could never return to plague the city. In later times it is thought that the pharmacoi were hurled from a height, as a symbol of their destruction, but were caught as they fell and then were banished from the city. These purification rites were to propitiate Apollo and expiate evil, so that he would not, in his wrath at the presence of pollution in the city, send the burning sun to dry up the harvest or cause pestilence to fall on the people. Pharmacoi were employed on other occasions and at other places besides Athens when pestilence, plague, or famine struck, to remove whatever impurity had brought down the wrath of a god and caused affliction to a city. The remaining day of the Thargelia was devoted to the offering of first fruits of the harvest to Apollo, now that the city was cleansed. Boys, both of whose parents were living, carried branches twined with wool and with offerings of the fruit of the earth hanging from them, to the sanctuary of Apollo and placed them before the doors there. Similar wool-twined branches were placed before the door of every Athenian house. A musical contest was held, the winners of which dedicated in the sanctuary of Pythian Apollo the tripods they won.

Thasus/Theagenes

honor of Apollo and Artemis, the Thargelia, was held in this month.

Thasus (thā'sus). In Greek legend, a son of Agenor of Canaan (afterward Phoenicia) and Telephassa. He was the brother of Cadmus, Cilix, Phineus, Phoenix, and Europa. When Europa was carried off by Zeus in the form of a bull, Agenor sent his sons to search for her. Thasus ended his search on the island of Thasus, which he colonized, and which took his name.

Thasus. An island in the N part of the Aegean Sea, S of E Macedonia, lying about four miles from the mainland. The surface is mountainous. It was colonized by Ionians from Paros about the end of the 8th century B.C., who either subdued or expelled the Thracian aborigines. Herodotus mentions having seen the rich gold mines that provided such a source of wealth to the inhabitants. Thasus carried on a prosperous trade with the Thracians, the Egyptians, and the Phoenicians, and by the 6th century B.C. had developed a flourishing civilization of its own. Histiaeus the Milesian fortified (c494 B.C.) the chief city (which had the same name as the island) with marble walls to protect it from attack. Darius the Great compelled the Thasians to dismantle the fortifications (491 B.C.); they were reconstructed, but again partly destroyed (464 B.C.) at the command of the Athenians. However, large parts remain to this day. During the Persian Wars Thasus was under the dominion of the Persians. The island later belonged to the Delian League, revolted c465 B.C. but was besieged and subjugated by Cimon. During the Peloponnesian Wars it changed hands between Athens and Sparta several times. It was subject to Philip V of Macedon, and later became a free city under the Romans, who accorded it a favorable position because, unlike the rest of Greece, it had favored Rome in the Mithridatic Wars. Polygnotus the painter (beginning of the 5th century B.C.) and Stesimbrotus the writer (end of the 5th century B.C.) were natives of the island. The French School of Athens engaged in excavations at Thasus from 1910. Among the notable remains are the ruins of the walls about the ancient citadel, with a block engraved with the name of the builder, a Hellenistic theater, the foundations of a temple of Pythian Apollo (5th century B.C.), and remains of two altars on the terrace of a sanctuary of Poseidon and a huge altar of Hera as protectress of ports. On the latter it was forbidden to sacrifice goats. There are also remains of sanctuaries of Dionysus and Heracles, and a museum houses numerous statues and fragments. According to legend, the island was colonized by Thasus, for whom it was named. He was a son of Agenor of Phoenicia. Wearied of searching for his sister Europa he settled on the island in accordance with instructions he received from the oracle of Apollo at Delphi. The chief protecting deities of the island in ancient times were Dionysus and Heracles.

Thasus. Chief town and ancient capital of the island of Thasus, situated on the N coast.

Thaumas (thou'mas). In Greek mythology, a son of Pontus and Gaea. He was the husband of Electra, daughter of Oceanus. Their children were the Harpies, Aello and Ocypete, and Iris of the "fast-flying feet" who became the messenger of the gods.

Thaumasium (thou-mā'si-um). In ancient geography, a mountain in Arcadia, Greece. Here, according to some accounts, Rhea gave Cronus a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes. Under the impression that it was his newborn son Zeus, Cronus swallowed the stone.

Thea (thē'a). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Chiron the centaur. She was a chaste companion of Artemis but was ravished by Aeolus, king of Magnesia in Thessaly. She feared her father's wrath if he should learn that she was about to bear a child. To protect her, Poseidon transformed her into a mare, Euippe, until after her child was born. When her foal Melanippe was born, Poseidon set the image of the mare among the stars as the constellation of the Horse, and transformed the foal into a baby girl.

Theaetetus (thē-ē-tē'tus). Athenian mathematician (died 369 B.C.); a disciple of Socrates. He is the principal character in one of the most famous of Plato's dialogues, named for him.

Theagenes (thē-aj'e-nēz). According to Pausanias, a son of Timosthenes, of Thasus. But some say that a phantom was his father, that Timosthenes was a priest of Heracles and that it was the phantom of the god himself who was the father of Theagenes, and that

thus he was the last of the Heraclidae. He was a great athlete and was said to have won 1400 times in the games. When he died, one of his enemies went every night to the bronze statue of Theagenes at Thasus and flogged it. The statue avenged itself by falling on the man and killing him. The sons of the dead man prosecuted the statue for murder. It was convicted and hurled into the sea. After this the land of Thasus became barren. The Thasians went to Delphi to consult the priestess on this matter and were told to take back their exiles. They obeyed, but the land remained barren. Again they went to Delphi. This time they were told, "But you have forgotten your great Theagenes." They were at a loss how to recover the statue of Theagenes which was at the bottom of the sea, but some fishermen were sent out and caught it up in a net. The Thasians set it up and ever after sacrificed to it as to a god. Many other places had statues of Theagenes, to which they offered sacrifices as to one who cures diseases.

Theagenes. Tyrant of Megara; fl. 7th century B.C. He obtained a bodyguard, overthrew the wealthy nobles of Megara, and made himself tyrant (c640 B.C.). His daughter was married to the Athenian Cylon, whom Theagenes encouraged to attempt to win control of Athens. The attempt ended in failure. Theagenes constructed an aqueduct for Megara during his rule. He was at length overthrown and banished from Megara.

Theano (thē-ā-nō). In Greek mythology, the wife of Metapontus, king of Icaria in Attica. She had no children and feared that her husband would abandon her if she remained childless. She tricked him by adopting twin boys who had been exposed to die and presenting them to Metapontus as her own children. The twins were the sons of Poseidon and Arne: Boeotus, founder of the Boeotians, and Aeolus, who became guardian of the winds. They had been ordered exposed by Desmontes, foster father of Arne, who had blinded and imprisoned their mother. Later Theano produced twin sons of her own. When they grew up, she became jealous because Metapontus, thinking that all four were his children, preferred Aeolus and Boeotus. She engineered a plot against them, advising her own sons to take advantage of a hunting expedition to kill Boeotus and Aeolus. They attempted to do so but, with the aid of Poseidon, Aeolus and Boeotus killed the sons of Theano and carried their dead bodies back to the palace. When Theano learned how her plot had miscarried, she committed suicide.

Theano. In Greek legend, a daughter of Cisseus, king of Thrace, and Teleclia. She was the wife of the Trojan Antenor, and among her sons were Acamas, Agenor, Archelochus, Helicaon, Iphidamas, and Polybus. She also tenderly reared Antenor's bastard son Pedaeus. Antenor and Theano believed that Helen and her possessions should be returned to Menelaus, and according to some accounts, they entertained Odysseus and Menelaus when they came on a mission to Troy to secure Helen's return. Theano was a priestess of Athena and, according to some accounts, it was she who gave the sacred Palladium to Odysseus and Diomedes when they entered the city in secret some time after the death of Hector. For these reasons the Greeks spared Antenor and Theano after the fall of Troy, and they crossed to Thrace and from there went to the northern part of Italy where, according to tradition, they eventually founded the city of Patavium (Padua).

Thebaid (thē'bā-id), The. An epic poem in 12 books by the Roman poet Publius Papinius Statius (c45-96 A.D.), based on the quarrel between Polynices and Eteocles for possession of Thebes which culminated in the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. It was published about 91 A.D. In the Middle Ages the Thebaid was widely admired, but modern scholarship does not accord it the status of a great work. (JJ)

Thebais (thē'bā-is). Greek epic poem of the Theban Cycle, of unknown authorship, relating to a legendary war between Argos and Thebes.

Theban Cycle (thē'ban). Group of legends or epics relating to the war between Argos and Thebes.

Thebe (thē'bē). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the river-god Asopus and Metope. She was the twin sister of Aegina, and like her was carried off by Zeus. She was known as the nymph of Thebes and, according to some accounts, married Zethus, one of the brothers who built the lower city. The name of the city, formerly Cadmea, was changed to Thebes in her honor.

Thebes (thēbz). [Modern Greek, Thevai: Latin, Thebae.] In ancient geography, the chief city of Boeotia in Greece. According to tradition, Cadmus the Phoenician came to Thebes following, in obedience to the command of the oracle of Delphi, a cow that had white moons on its flanks. Where the cow sank to rest, he was instructed to build his city. This it did at Thebes and there Cadmus slew the dragon that guarded the fountain of Ares and sowed its teeth to raise a race of warriors. But some say that before Cadmus came into the land it was occupied by the Ectenes, whose king Ogygus, or Ogyges, was an aborigine who reigned before the great flood that Zeus sent to engulf Hellas. The Ectenes perished by pestilence. The land was occupied by the Hyantes and Aones, and it was in this time that Cadmus came and built the upper citadel, called the Cadmea, where he had his own house. The room in the house where his daughter Semele gave birth to Dionysus was barred to men as late as the 2nd century A.D., when the traveler Pausanias visited Thebes. (Excavations at Thebes have uncovered the remains of what is called the "palace of Cadmus.") The city was first called Cadmea and its inhabitants were known as Cadmeans. Later Amphion and Zethus came and conquered it and built the lower city and the walls. The name was changed to Thebes in honor, some say, of the nymph Thebe, daughter of the river-god Asopus. She was the wife of Zethus. Thebes was celebrated as the birthplace of Dionysus, Heracles, the seer Tiresias, Amphion and Zethus, and many others. It was the scene of the exploits and tragedies of the Labdacids, descendants of Cadmus, the family of which Laius, Oedipus, and his descendants were members. It was the target of the Expedition of the Seven against Thebes, caused by the rivalry between Polynices and Eteocles, sons of Oedipus; and of the war of the Epigoni, undertaken by the sons of the original Seven, in which the Thebans were overcome and the city was taken. King Thersander, grandson of Oedipus, was slain in Mysia in the early years of the Trojan War. His grandson, Autesion, became king of Thebes, but on the advice of the oracle left the city and brought to an end the long line of Labdacid kings of Thebes. Within 60 years of the end of the Trojan War Thebes had become the capital of the cities of Boeotia. The wall of the ancient city was pierced by seven gates—the Electran, Proetidian, Neïstan, Crenaeon, Hypsistan, Ogygian, and Homoloid Gates. Outside the Electran Gate, on a slight eminence, was the temple of Ismenian Apollo. The priest in the temple was a boy of noble family who served for one year. He was called a "laurel-bearer," from the wreath of laurel he wore. Heracles was one of these laurel-bearers, according to some accounts, and his foster father Amphitryon dedicated in the temple a bronze tripod in his name which was inscribed with the "Cadmean" letters said to have been introduced into Greece by Cadmus. Before the temple was a stone called "Manto's chair." She was the prophetic daughter of Tiresias; and within the temple was an image of Apollo of cedar wood, made by Canachus. Among the treasures of the temple were a shield, spear, and tripod, all of solid gold, dedicated by King Croesus of Lydia. The site of the temple was discovered in 1910. Among the sights of Thebes were a sanctuary of Heracles decorated with marble sculptures representing most of his great labors; a temple of Artemis Euclia (Of Good Repute) with an image by Scopas, before which was a stone lion dedicated by Heracles after he defeated Erginus; the spring where Oedipus washed off the blood that had splattered on him when he slew his father; the spring where Cadmus slew the dragon of Ares and brought down the wrath of that god on his descendants; a shrine and tomb of Amphion outside the Ogygian Gate, and, farther off, a shrine of Iolaus, the companion of Heracles; the tomb, near the Neïstan Gate, of Menoeceus, son of Creon, who voluntarily leaped from the walls of Thebes to his death in order to propitiate Ares and save the city when the Seven attacked it; a sanctuary of Athena near the Hypsistan Gate, where Cadmus, having killed the dragon, sacrificed a cow to the goddess; a temple containing ancient wooden images of Aphrodite, said to have been made from the figureheads of the ships that brought Cadmus to Greece and dedicated by his wife Harmonia; the grave of Trojan Hector near the fountain where Oedipus cleansed his hands, for Hector's bones were brought to Thebes in obedience to an oracle; a temple of Ammon containing an image dedicated by Pindar; and Pindar's tomb.

Modern scholars say Thebes was early settled by Boeotians from Thessaly, and that by the 7th century B.C. it was the capital of a loose confederation of Boeotian cities, from which, however, the wealthy Boeotian city of Orchomenus held aloof. In 509 B.C. the Boeotian city of Plataea sought the protection of Athens and became a staunch ally of that city and the implacable enemy of Thebes. The protection that Athens rendered Plataea caused a quarrel between Athens and Thebes and they became enemies. When Xerxes invaded Greece, Theban troops under Leonidas at Thermopylae (480 B.C.) served unwillingly, according to Herodotus, and after the defeat of the Greek forces there, the Thebans allied themselves openly with Persia, fought on the Persian side, and shared in the Persian defeat at Plataea (479 B.C.). Some say the Thebans fought on the side of the Persians against their will, compelled by their aristocratic rulers who hated Athenian democracy. After the Persian War the rivalry with Athens, now stronger than ever, flared anew. In a battle at Tanagra (457 B.C.) the Thebans, with the aid of the Spartans, defeated the Athenians but could not press their advantage, and were defeated by the Athenians at Oenophyta in 456 B.C. During the Peloponnesian Wars Thebes was the bitter enemy of Athens and rendered aid to Sparta. The partnership with Sparta was an unequal one, however, and there were many Theban voices raised against Sparta in the years immediately following the long wars. Following a defeat at Coronea (394 B.C.) Thebes was forced to yield to Sparta (392 B.C.). In 382 B.C. the Spartans, by a conspiracy with malcontents within the city, gained control of the citadel of Thebes. They arranged to seize it on the day when the Thesmophoria was being celebrated, for on that day only women, celebrating the feast, occupied it. The Spartans thus took it without resistance and established a government friendly to Sparta. This government, and the Spartan officials in Thebes, were overthrown (379 B.C.) by a most daring coup of Pelopidas, the Theban general and good friend of Epaminondas. Under command of Epaminondas, the Thebans defeated Sparta at the battle of Leuctra (371 B.C.) and again at Mantinea (362 B.C.), and established Theban hegemony of Greece. Epaminondas was killed at Mantinea and those who assumed power in Thebes exercised power over the Boeotian cities so tyrannously that they earned for Thebes a hatred that ultimately led to the destruction of the city. Thebes took part in the Sacred War (354 B.C.) that was carried on intermittently about Delphi for ten years. She was allied with Athens in the attempt to hold back Philip of Macedon and was defeated with her at Chaeronea (338 B.C.), and was severely treated by Philip, who stationed a Macedonian garrison in the city. On the death of Philip the Thebans rebelled. Philip's son, Alexander the Great, marched against it and subdued it. At his side fought the Boeotian enemies of Thebes. Alexander gave the beleaguered city every opportunity to surrender without bloodshed, but the defenders refused, the citadel was taken, and 6000 Thebans were massacred before Alexander put a stop to the slaughter. He entrusted the fate of the city to the hands of his Greek allies; they decreed that the people be sold into slavery and the city razed to the ground. At the command of Alexander, one house was spared, that of Pindar the poet, which stood alone among the ruins. Before Alexander took the city, the Thebans were warned of their black fate by a prodigy: a spider spun a black web over the entrance to the sanctuary of Demeter, the temple in which, in happier times, the shields of the Spartans who fell at Leuctra had been dedicated by the victorious Thebans. The city was rebuilt by Cassander, who restored the ancient walls, but it lapsed into insignificance under the Roman Empire. Remains of the walls of the ancient city are still to be seen but much of the ancient city now lies buried under 15 to 20 feet of earth.

Thelpusa (thel-pū'sa). In ancient geography, a town in Arcadia, Greece, on a hill near the Ladon River. It was said to have been actor; up, lūte, pūll; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ġ as d or j, ſ as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z̃ as z or zh.

named for a daughter of the river-god Ladon. The Thelpusians named Demeter Erinys (Fury) because of her great rage when Poseidon, transformed into a stallion, attacked her when she was disguised as a mare and was grazing with the mares of Oncus. Afterward, Demeter's wrath abated, and she bathed herself in the river and they gave her the name Lusia (Bather). The Thelpusians had images of the goddess of both names. Their image of Fury held a torch in one hand and a chest in the other. The Thelpusians also said they were the first to give the name Hippios (Horse) to Pōseidon, because of the horse Arion that Demeter bore to him. Some say the infant Asclepius, son of Apollo and Coronis, was exposed at birth in Thelpusa, and was found by Autolaus, an illegitimate son of Arcas. For this reason the Thelpusians had a sanctuary of Asclepius Pais (Boy). They also had a sanctuary of the 12 gods.

Themis (thē'mis). In Greek mythology, a Titaness, the daughter of Gaea and Uranus. She was the mother by Zeus of the Moerae (Fates)—Atropos, Clotho, and Lachesis; of the Horae (Seasons); and of Prometheus. Early mythology says that she received the oracle of Delphi from Gaea, and the prophetic gift remained one of her attributes, for she warned her son Prometheus of what was in store for him. Later Themis, no longer the wife of Zeus, is the "fair-faced divinity," the handmaiden of the gods who presides with Zeus over justice and order, and sits on the throne beside him as his trusted counselor. She is the patron goddess of the rights of hospitality and a protector of the oppressed. It was Themis who told Deucalion and Pyrrha how to repopulate the earth after the disastrous flood which had swept away all mankind save these two. Themis, with the power of foretelling the future, told Poseidon, and after him Zeus, that Thetis the Nereid whom both were pursuing, would bear a son greater than his father. Because of this Zeus abandoned his designs on Thetis and wed her to Peleus. Themis, who became the personification of law, custom, and justice, was worshiped especially in Athens, Delphi, Olympia, Thebes, and Troezen.

Themiste (thē-mis'tē), or Themis. According to legend, a daughter of Laomedon and Eurydice. She married Capys, the son of Assaracus, and was the mother of Anchises.

Themisto (thē-mis'tō). In Greek legend, a wife of Athamas. According to some accounts, Athamas married her after he had settled in Thessaly, having been banished from Boeotia after the death of Ino and his sons, and raised a new family. But others say that Ino, the wife of Athamas and the mother of his sons Learchus and Melicertes, went out hunting one day and did not return. A blood-stained robe that was found convinced Athamas that Ino had been killed by wild beasts. After a brief period of mourning he married Themisto. But Ino had only gone to Mount Parnassus for a prolonged revel with the maenads and by the time Athamas learned that she was still alive Themisto had borne him twin sons. Athamas tried to conceal Ino as a nurse for his young children but Themisto learned her true identity, although she pretended not to know who Ino was. She went to the nursery and told the new nurse to prepare mourning garments for the two sons of the former wife of Athamas, and told the new nurse (Ino) that the garments were to be used on the next day. The next day Themisto ordered her servants to break into the nursery and kill the two children who were dressed in mourning garments. The servants obeyed her orders but Ino, suspecting foul play by Themisto, had dressed the children of Themisto in mourning garments rather than her own children. Thus it was the children of Themisto that were killed. When Athamas learned of their deaths he went mad, killed his son Learchus and would have killed Ino and Melicertes, but she took her son in her arms and leaped into the sea. Themisto, learning of the death of her children by her own orders, killed herself.

Themistocles (thē-mis'tō-klēz). Athenian statesman and commander, born c528 B.C.; died, in Asia, c462 B.C. He became a political leader in opposition to Aristides, who was ostracized in 483 B.C., and, recognizing the continued Persian threat, was instrumental in increasing the naval resources of Athens. He persuaded the Athenians to use the money in their treasury to build up the fleet to 200 ships. When Xerxes made ready to invade Greece, the Athenians consulted the oracle

at Delphi. The priestess predicted utter destruction for the Athenians and urged them to fly. The Athenians again sought the priestess as suppliants, and said they would not leave the precinct until they received a more favorable response. The priestess answered them thus:

When the foe shall have taken whatever the limit of Cecrops

Holds within it, . . .

Then far-seeing Zeus grants this to the prayers of Athena:

Safe shall the wooden wall continue for thee and thy children.

Yet shall a day arrive when ye shall meet him in battle.

Holy Salamis, thou shalt destroy the offspring of women,

When men scatter the seed, or when they gather the harvest.

Though this seemed somewhat more hopeful, it was open to various interpretations. Some thought "the wooden wall" referred to the Citadel of Athens, which had originally been of wood. Others thought "the wooden wall" meant the ships, but those who took this view were disturbed by the reference to Salamis and thought it meant that the fleet would be defeated there. Themistocles now came forward. According to his interpretation, "the wooden wall" meant the ships, and the inclusion of "Holy Salamis" indicated a victory there. The Athenians, determined to preserve their liberty at any cost, adopted his view and prepared to defend themselves with their fleet. Themistocles went as one of the commanders of a Greek expedition to Thessaly while Xerxes was preparing to pass into Europe from Asia, but the expedition withdrew on the advice of messengers from Macedonia. Later, at Artemisium, he is said to have accepted a bribe from the Euboeans to make a stand at Artemisium and protect the Euboeans. He used part of the money to bribe other commanders, who wished to withdraw, and the remainder he kept for himself, unknown to anyone. The battle fought at Artemisium, at the same time as the land battle at Thermopylae, was inconclusive, but the Persians suffered great losses through storms at sea. When Athens was at length overrun by the Persians, the Athenian fleet withdrew to Salamis. Themistocles wanted to engage the Persian fleet there, but had great difficulty persuading the other captains to do so, particularly the most important of the allies, the Spartans, who wished to retire to the Isthmus, build a wall across it, and defend the Peloponnesus. Themistocles understood that the Greek fleet, because of its superior maneuverability, could do great damage to the Persian fleet in the enclosed area of Salamis, whereas in the open sea the Persians would have the advantage. To force the hand of his unwilling allies, Themistocles sent a messenger to the Persian fleet. The burden of his message, which was true, was that the Greeks, in fear of the Persians, were on the point of flight; that they were at odds with each other; and that now was the time for the Persians to strike. The Persians took cognizance of the message and redeployed their land and sea forces to surround the Greeks at Salamis. While the Greek captains argued, Aristides, the old enemy of Themistocles, but one with him in his desire to preserve Greek liberty, came to them and told them their arguments were now academic, as they were surrounded. Thus, thanks to Themistocles, the matter was taken out of their hands; they had no option but to fight on the site Themistocles had chosen, and won a magnificent victory at Salamis (480 B.C.). After the victory and the flight of the Persians, Themistocles was out-voted in his desire to pursue the Persians to the Hellespont and destroy the bridges which they must use to return their land forces to Asia. Seeing that the allies would not go, he prevailed on the Athenians to give up the pursuit. At the end of the war all Greece rang with the fame of Themistocles, but through the jealousy and rivalry of the commanders, the Athenians withheld the honor that was his due to him—the crown of victory. He went to Sparta and was received and honored as no other stranger had ever been honored by the Spartans. When the Persians had withdrawn, the Athenians returned to rebuild their ruined city. Themistocles urged them to drop everything and rebuild the walls of the city, and also to build a walled way between Athens and her port, Piraeus, so that they would always have access to their fleet. The Athenians did as he advised, but after the dangers of the war had passed, there were many in Athens who were bitterly jealous of Themistocles. The story of his bribe to remain and fight at Artemisium came out, and he was ostracized (c471 B.C.). He lived in exile in Argos and elsewhere. He was charged with complicity in the treason of the Spartan Pausanias, who planned to rule Greece with Persian aid; learning that the Athenians planned to seize him, as the Spartans had seized Pausanias, he fled. He went to Corcyra, and ultimately to Asia, where he sent a message to King Artaxerxes. He made a claim on the friendship of Artaxerxes, son of Xerxes, because, he said, he had prevented the Athenians from sailing to the Hellespont and destroying the bridges by which the Persian army of his father returned to Asia. He asked to be allowed to stay in Asia one year, at the end of which time he promised to present himself to the king. Artaxerxes granted his request. Themistocles spent his year of grace learning the Persian language and customs of the country. At the end of the year he arrived at the court of Artaxerxes and was received with every evidence of respect and honor. He put his genius at the service of Artaxerxes and was rewarded by being named governor of the district of Asiatic Magnesia. Thucydides speaks of Themistocles as a man who exhibited "the most indubitable signs of genius," one who had an extraordinary and unparalleled claim on Greek admiration because of his native capacity, his ability to meet any emergency, and his wisdom as to present courses and future prospects. Though there was a story that he committed suicide, because he failed in his promises to the Persian king, Thucydides says he died of disease. A monument to him was set up in Magnesia. Because he was charged with treason, he could not lawfully be buried in Athens, but relatives secretly took up his bones and buried them in his native soil.

Theoclymenus (thē'ō-klī'mē-nus). In the Odyssey, a son of the seer Polyphides and a descendant of Melampus. He was also a seer. He was compelled to flee from his home in Argos for committing a murder, and met Telemachus when the latter was at the court of Nestor in Pylus in search of news of his father Odysseus. Telemachus gave Theoclymenus his protection and took him back to Ithaca. There Theoclymenus told Penelope that Odysseus still lived and would soon return, as he was actually then in his homeland. Theoclymenus also prophesied their end to Penelope's suitors, but they mocked his words.

Theoclymenus. According to Euripides, a son of Psamathe and Proteus, king of Egypt. He succeeded his father. Having determined to marry Helen, who had been transported to Egypt while a phantom Helen went to Troy, he became a fierce enemy of the Greeks and killed any who chanced to land in his country. He was about to kill his sister Theonoë because she had not told him that Menelaus had landed in Egypt, and as a result Menelaus succeeded in escaping with Helen, but the Dioscuri (Helen's brothers) appeared in the heavens and told him to spare her; that all had been done at the will of the gods.

Theocritus (thē-ok'ri-tus). Greek idyllic poet; born at Syracuse; fl. in the 3rd century B.C. He lived at Cos, at Alexandria, where Ptolemy Philadelphus was his patron, and at Syracuse, where Hiero II was his patron. Two of his 32 surviving Idylls are appeals to his patrons. Theocritus is credited with being the inventor of pastoral poetry. Ten of the Idylls describe, with gently nostalgic sweetness, the life of herdsmen, shepherds, and fishermen. The life so described is on the one hand idealized and on the other marked with touching and realistic detail. The Adoniazusae is in mimetic style and tells of the adventures of two Syracusan women at the great feast of Adonis at Alexandria. His Dirge on Daphnis has been widely imitated, both by the ancients and later poets. Other surviving Idylls are love poems, studies of the ordinary life of the people, and two occasional poems which "are not only gems in themselves, but leave the fragrance of a lovable character behind them." (Gilbert Murray). The Roman poet Vergil was strongly influenced by Theocritus, and eight of Vergil's ten Eclogues are modelled after or inspired by Theocritus' Idylls.

Theognis (thē-og'nis). Greek elegiac and gnomic poet; born in Megara; fl. in the middle or last part of the 6th century B.C.

He was an aristocrat, who lived at a time when the noble class was being tumbled from power and its position as the cultural leader of the state by uprisings of the people. Theognis saw his friends slain, lost his fortune, and was driven into exile, from which he returned only after many years. His work is then, not unnaturally, everywhere marked by a violent hatred of the "demos," "who knows no standard to tell them what is noble and ignoble, because they have no tradition," and by his exhortations to preserve the ideals of culture of his own class, which has standards and tradition. The works of Theognis are largely directed to the young nobleman Cynus, squire and intimate of the poet. They are maxims, precepts by which Cynus will attain the noble manhood expected of one of his class. He is exhorted by Theognis to tell the truth, to avoid the company of base men, to fight bravely, and to be loyal to his friend. The work of Theognis that survives was preserved in an anthology that was used in the 3rd century B.C. as a book of precepts for the young. The collection includes interpolated selections from Solon, Mimnermus, Tyrtaeus, and others.

Theogony (thē-og'ō-ni), The. Ancient Greek poem of 1022 lines, attributed to Hesiod, treating of the origin of the order of nature from chaos and the origin of the gods.

Theonoë (thē-on'ō-ē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Thestor, and the sister of Calchas who accompanied the Greeks to Troy, and of Leucippe. While at play on the seashore near Troy she was captured by pirates and sold to King Icarus of Caria, whose mistress she became. Some time later a handsome young priest of Apollo arrived in Caria. Theonoë fell in love with him but he scorned her advances. Theonoë, enraged, resolved to have the priest slain, but did not want to ask her slaves to commit the sacrilege of killing a priest, so she ordered that one of the foreign slaves must slay him. The foreign slave went to the room where the priest was confined and announced that he had been ordered to kill him but that he refused to do so; rather, he would kill himself, but first he wanted to tell how he came to be in such a sad plight. The priest announced that he was Thestor, the father of Theonoë and Leucippe, and that he had fallen into the hands of the king's concubine while searching for his lost daughter Theonoë; then, as he made ready to kill himself, the priest of Apollo revealed that he was really Leucippe, Thestor's own daughter, disguised as a priest at the command of the oracle of Delphi and engaged on the same errand as Thestor, namely, a search for Theonoë. Father and daughter wept in each other's arms and then resolved to kill the king's wicked mistress. They entered Theonoë's apartments and Leucippe announced to her that for lusting after the young priest, she must prepare to die at the hands of Thestor, son of Idmon. Hereupon Theonoë revealed that she was the daughter of Thestor who had been carried away by pirates years before and had not recognized her father and sister. Now all three rejoiced and gave thanks to Apollo. King Icarus, being informed of their history, gave Theonoë her freedom and sent them all home together.

Theonoë. According to Euripides, a daughter of Psamathe and Proteus, king of Egypt. She was a prophetess and knew that Menelaus had landed in Egypt, seven years after the Trojan War ended. She decided not to tell her brother, who was wooing Helen, because Helen had been brought to Egypt to be protected by Proteus until Menelaus could claim her. By her silence she allowed Menelaus and Helen to escape.

Theophane (thē-of'a-nē). In Greek mythology, a beautiful maiden, the cousin of Phrixus and Helle. She had many suitors, among them Poseidon. To get her away from the other suitors he carried her off to the island of Crumissa. When her other suitors followed, he transformed her into a ewe and himself into a ram and the inhabitants of the island into cattle. The suitors, arriving and finding no people, slew the cattle and began to eat them. Poseidon changed them into wolves. In his form of a ram he married Theophane and she bore him the ram with the golden fleece that bore Phrixus to safety in Colchis and whose fleece was the object of the expedition of the Argonauts.

Theophrastus (thē-ō-fras'tus). Greek philosopher and naturalist; born at Eresus, Lesbos, c372 B.C.; died c287 B.C. After studying philosophy at Lesbos he went to Athens, where he became first a pupil of Plato and then a disciple of Aristotle. His name was originally Tyrtamus. Aristotle gave him the name Theophrastus (Divine Speaker) in acknowledgment of his power of language. Aristotle made him the guardian of his son, bequeathed him his library, and named him as his successor at the Lyceum. His History of Plants and other botanical works were the most important contributions to botanical science of antiquity. His other scientific-philosophical work is also important in the development of scientific thought. Theophrastus is also remembered for his 30 short Characters, vivid vignettes of such types as The Flatterer, The Grumbler, and The Boastful Man.

Theopompus (thē-ō-pom'pus). King of Sparta who took Messenia for Sparta in the First Messenian War. His tomb was near the sanctuary of Lycurgus in Sparta.

Theopompus. Greek historian and rhetorician; born in Chios, c378 B.C.; died about the end of the 4th century B.C. In his youth he went to Athens with his father, who had been forced to leave Chios because of his pro-Spartan leanings. In Athens Theopompus became a pupil of Isocrates the orator. He mastered the techniques of oratory so thoroughly that he not only spoke with success throughout Greece, but even won (351 B.C.) in a rhetorical contest sponsored by Queen Artemisia of Pergamum in honor of her husband Mausolus. He returned to Chios under the patronage of Alexander the Great, but on the death of the latter was again obliged to leave, as his aristocratic views and Macedonian leanings made him extremely unpopular. He went to Alexandria and there disappears from history. The Hellenica of Theopompus, in 12 books, was a continuation of the History of Thucydides to 394 B.C. His Philippica, in 58 books, was a history of his own times, in which Philip II of Macedon was the central figure. He included so many digressions in the latter work that, so it is said, when Philip extracted the digressions the work was reduced to 16 books. The Philippica is thought to be the only Greek work concerning Philip which made an honest attempt to portray the man and his deeds and which recognized his greatness as well as his weaknesses. Only fragments of these works survive.

Theoricon (thē-or'i-kon) In ancient Athens, a public appropriation, including, besides the moneys for the conduct of public festivals and sacrifices, supplementary to the impositions (liturgies) on individuals for some of these purposes, a fund which was distributed at the rate of two obols per person per day to poor citizens, ostensibly to pay for their seats in the theater or for other individual expenses at festivals. The funds of the Theoricon were deposited in the Theoric Fund which ultimately became so important that a special minister was required to manage it. The use to which the Theoric Fund was put was influential in gaining the good will of the people and came to be a political weapon of some importance. In the time of Demosthenes the money of the fund, thanks to his influence, was used for military purposes.

Theoxenus (thē-ok-sē'nus). An epithet of Apollo, meaning "Strangers' God."

Thera (thir'a, thē'ra). [Also: Thira, Santorin.] Volcanic island in the S part of the Cyclades. According to legend, it rose from the sea when Euphemus the Argonaut flung into the sea at this spot a clod of earth given to him as a gift by Triton. It became the home of the descendants of Euphemus, and was known by the name Calliste. According to Herodotus, Cadmus stopped at Calliste when he sailed in search of Europa, and left a colony there. His descendants were on the island eight generations later when Theras, a Spartan, brought emigrants from Sparta to the island and founded a colony. In his honor the island was renamed Thera. It was from Thera that Battus later, at the command of the oracle of Delphi, colonized Libya. This was the colony that was sent forth to Cyrene in 631 B.C. The island rises steeply from the sea, and has long been celebrated for its volcanic activity. The sea forced a way into the volcanic cone and provided a deep anchorage for ships, almost at the center of the island. At times the water at certain spots can be seen to bubble from the subterranean pressures of the volcano. An eruption of the volcano occurred in 1956. Area of the island, 30 square miles; length, 10 miles.

Theramenes (thē-ram'ē-nēz). Athenian politician and military commander; executed 404 B.C. He was one of the leaders in the establishment (411 B.C.) of the oligarchic rule of the Four Hundred, which he later opposed for its extremity. He served at Cyzicus, Arginusae, and elsewhere, and was instrumental in procuring the condemnation of the Athenian generals after Arginusae. He was one of the negotiators (405-404 B.C.) for peace with Sparta, became one of the Thirty Tyrants, and through the influence of Critias was forced to drink poison.

Therapne (thē-rap'nē). In Greek legend, a daughter of Lelex, who gave her name to a town in Laconia between Amyclae and Sparta, near the Eurotas River. Some say Helen and Menelaus were buried here, and sacrifices were offered to both as to a goddess and a god, and festivals were held for them. There was a sanctuary there which some thought was a sanctuary of Helen but others say it was a temple of Menelaus. At Therapne, according to some accounts, there was a burial place of the Dioscuri.

Therimachus (thē-rim'a-kus). According to some accounts, the eldest son of Heracles and Megara. He was intended to succeed Eurystheus but was slain by Heracles in a fit of madness.

Theritas (thē-rī'tas). Epithet of Ares, under which he was worshiped in Laconia. Young dogs were sacrificed at the sanctuary of Ares Theritas on the road from Amyclae to Therapne in Laconia, the oldest sanctuary of Ares. The image in the temple was said to have been brought from the temple of Ares in Colchis by the Dioscuri. Some say the name Theritas was given Ares because he had a Colchian nurse named Thero. Others say this name comes from a word meaning "wild beast," and was given to him because he is a war and battle god, and when one engages in battle one must cast aside all qualities of gentleness and humanity.

Therma (thēr'ma). In ancient geography, a city of Macedonia, situated at the head of the Thermaic Gulf (Gulf of Salonika), which was named for the city. Xerxes stopped here in his invasion of Greece, 480

B.C. It was held briefly by the Athenians just before the Peloponnesian Wars. About 316 B.C. Cassander founded the city of Thessalonica nearby and Therma was absorbed in it.

Thermae Himeraeae (thēr'mē him-ēr-ē'ē) or Himerenses (him-ēr-en'sēz). [Modern name, Termini Imerese.] In ancient geography, a town on the N coast of Sicily. It was founded (407 B.C.) by the Carthaginians, near the site of Himera, which they had destroyed. The town was on the hill above "the hot baths of the Nymphs" mentioned by Pindar. Its name, Thermae, refers to the hot springs, and the name Himeraeae signalizes the old Greek city that was destroyed. Greek settlers soon came to live in the Carthaginian town of Thermae Himeraeae and made of it a Greek town. Much contested between Syracusans and Carthaginians, it finally became a Roman town. Among scanty remains of antiquity are those of a Roman theater.

Thermaic Gulf (thēr-mā'ik) or Thermaicus Sinus (thēr-mā'i-kus sī'nus). Northwesternmost arm of the Aegean Sea, situated W of the Chalcidice peninsula. Length, about 70 miles.

Thermasia (thēr-mā'si-a). Epithet of Demeter. Demeter Thermasia (Warmth) was worshiped at Hermion and Troezen.

Thermodon (thēr'mō-don). In ancient geography, a river of Pontus. The area about its mouth was traditionally the home of the Amazons.

Thermopylae (thēr-mop'i-lē). Hot salt springs on the border of Locris; the name means "hot gates." According to some accounts, Heracles, preparing to sacrifice to Zeus after his conquest of Eurytus, donned a ceremonial robe his wife sent to him here. The robe had been secretly anointed by his wife with the dried blood of his fallen enemy, the centaur Nessus. When the heat of the sacrificial fires melted the blood poisoned by one of Heracles' own arrows, the robe clung to Heracles and seared and stung his flesh. Maddened by the burning pain, he leaped into the waters to cool his body, but the heat of his flesh was so intense it caused the waters to bubble and steam. Ever since, these springs have been hot. The springs are at the narrow pass of the same name which runs from Thessaly to Locris, between Mount Oeta and a marsh bordering the Maliacus Sinus (Gulf of Lamia). (The configuration of the land has been somewhat changed in modern times.) Through it passed the only road from N to S Greece. Here occurred (480 B.C.) one of the most famous conflicts of the Persian Wars. A small band of Greeks under the Spartan Leonidas defended the pass against a vast army under Xerxes. Their position was betrayed, and Leonidas sent away his troops, except for 300 Spartans and 700 Thespians. These remained and with unmatched courage resisted the Persians until all were slain. According to Herodotus, two Spartans had been sent to the rear before the final battle, because they were afflicted by diseases of the eye. When they heard of the assault being made against Leonidas, one of them ordered his slave to bring him his armor and lead him to the battle. The slave did so and fled; his master plunged into the fight and perished with his friends. The other Spartan afflicted with a disease of the eyes used his sickness as an excuse to stay away from the battle and later returned to Sparta. There he was greeted with disgrace. No Spartan would give him a light to kindle his fire, nor would any Spartan speak with him. But this man, Aristodemus, redeemed himself later at the battle of Plataea (479 B.C.). Another Spartan who survived because he had been sent as an envoy to Thessaly by Leonidas was in such disgrace when he returned to Sparta that he hanged himself. In 279 or 278 B.C., the allied Greeks attempted unsuccessfully to prevent the passage of the Gauls under Brennus through the pass; and here, in 191 B.C., the Romans under Glabrio defeated Antiochus III of Syria.

Thero (thē'rō). According to some accounts, a nurse of Ares, thought to be from Colchis.

Theron (thē'rōn). Tyrant of Acragas in Sicily (488-472 B.C.). His daughter Damareta was married to Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse, with whom Theron had close political ties. Under Theron, whose rule is said to have been mild and just, Acragas prospered and became second only to Syracuse in wealth. A quarrel between Theron and Terillus, tyrant of Himera, gave the Carthaginians an opportunity to interfere in Sicily. Theron united with Gelon to drive them out (480 B.C.), and as a result he won control of Himera. After the war he devoted himself to the enlargement and beautification of Acragas. In his time the foundations were laid for the row of temples along the south wall of the city that were brought to magnificent completion only long after his death.

Thersander (thēr-san'dēr). In Greek legend, a son of Polynices and Argia. He was one of the Epigoni who marched against Thebes to avenge their fathers for their disastrous defeat in the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. Thersander, like his father before him, bribed Eriphyle, mother of Alcmaeon. He gave her the robe of Harmonia to influence her son to command the expedition of the Epigoni. His boast, after the successful completion of the war, that the success was due to him because of his bribe, was overheard by Alcmaeon and led to Eriphyle's death at the hands of her son. Thersander became king of Thebes after the city was captured. By his wife Demonassa he was the father of Tisamenus. Thersander, in company with Diomedes, brought forty ships to the Trojan War. According to some accounts, he was killed when the Greeks raided the kingdom of Telephus in Mysia. Telephus drove the Greeks back, all except Thersander, who bravely withstood him and was killed. Diomedes performed the funeral rites for his burial in Mysia and a shrine was erected to him. But others say Thersander survived the battle in Mysia, went on with the Greeks to Troy, and ultimately was one of those who entered Troy in the Wooden Horse.

Thersilion (thēr-sil'i-on). The convention hall of the federal assembly of the Arcadian League at Megalopolis, named for its founder, built in the 4th century B.C., and notable for its size (over 35,000 square feet), and the ingenious arrangement of the interior columns supporting the roof, which, in order to reduce to the minimum their obstruction of the view from any part of the hall, are ranged in lines radiating from the speaker's platform. The Thersilion is connected to the theater of Megalopolis,

with which it forms an architectural whole; its Doric entrance portico of 14 columns faced the auditorium and served as a permanent scene. Megalopolis was destroyed in 222 B.C. and the Thersilion apparently was not rebuilt. (JJ)

Thersilochus (thēr-sil'ō-kus). In the Iliad, a Paeonian ally of the Trojans. He was slain by Achilles on the banks of the Xanthus as he sped in full flight before the raging Achilles after the death of Patroclus. Aeneas met his shade in the Underworld when he visited Anchises there.

Thersites (thēr-sī'tēz). In the Iliad, a son of Agrius of Aetolia. He was bowlegged, lame, and deformed in the shoulders. Homer says that he was the ugliest Greek at Troy. He roused the wrath of Odysseus by accusing Agamemnon of greed and Achilles of cowardice. Odysseus beat him and threatened to drive him off in dishonor if he again heard him assail the name of Agamemnon. His impudent, quarrelsome, abusive nature made him disliked by his fellow Greeks. No one mourned when Achilles, enraged because Thersites had mocked him for his grief over the death of Penthesilea, smote him so hard that his teeth fell out, accompanied by his gushing blood, and he fell to earth dead.

Theseum (thē-sē'um). A hieron or sanctuary near the Agora of Athens, dedicated to the hero-king Theseus, but not yet identified by the Agora excavators. Here were reburied, as those of Theseus, the bones brought by Cimon from Scyrus; on its walls were famous paintings, and it was a familiar place of refuge. The well-preserved Periclean marble temple which stands on the terrace dominating the Agora on the west was formerly considered to be a temple of Theseus, and is pictured under the name of Theseum in many older works on the antiquities of Athens. It has now been shown beyond reasonable doubt that this temple was dedicated to Hephaestus, or to Hephaestus and Athena, and it is probable that the real sanctuary of Theseus did not contain a temple. In the meantime, however, the erroneous identification had suggested a name, the "Theseum Architect," for the otherwise nameless architect who designed the temple of Hephaestus and other struc-

Theseum Architect. A name, inspired by the erroneous identification of the Theseum at Athens with the temple of Hephaestus, retained as a convenient designation for the otherwise nameless master architect who designed the Periclean marble temples of Hephaestus and Ares at Athens, of Poseidon at Sunium, and of Nemesis at Rhamnus. (JJ)

Theseus (thē'sös, thē'sē-us). In Greek legend, an Athenian hero, the Athenian counterpart of Heracles, who traced his descent from Erechtheus and Pelops. Aegeus, king of Athens, being childless, consulted the oracle at Delphi. He could not interpret the answer the priestess gave him and later, when visiting Pittheus, son of Pelops, in Troezen, he told Pittheus the oracular pronouncement and asked what it meant. Pittheus, renowned for his wisdom, did not interpret the response. He entertained Aegeus lavishly and when he was flushed with wine, he sent his own daughter Aethra in to him. Aegeus embraced her. The same night Aethra, in obedience to a dream, waded across the sea to a nearby island and was ravished by Poseidon. For this reason Poseidon is sometimes called the father of Theseus, and indeed many times he came to the hero's aid, but generally Theseus is called the son of Aegeus. Before Aegeus left Troezen, he placed a sword and a pair of sandals under a huge stone. He told Aethra if she should bear a son, to rear him in secret in Troezen, lest the 50 sons of Pallas should seek to destroy him. When she thought he was strong enough, she was to take him to the rock. If he could lift it and recover the sword and sandals, Aegeus said, she was to send him to Athens. Aegeus then departed. In due course Aethra bore a son and named him Theseus, because of the tokens Aegeus had "deposited" under the rock, but some say he took this name later. He was reared in Troezen by his grandfather Pittheus. When he grew to young manhood, Theseus journeyed to Delphi to offer the first clippings of his hair to Apollo, as was the custom. He was a strong, spirited, intelligent youth. On his return, Aethra told him the story of his birth and led him to the rock under which the tokens lay. Theseus easily lifted it and recovered the sword and sandals. Then, following the instructions of Aegeus, he set out for Athens. Aethra and Pittheus urged him to go by sea, as the land route was made dangerous by brigands, monsters, and terrorists. But Theseus, in the hope of emulating his greatly admired relative Heracles, determined to follow the more hazardous overland route. He wished, he said, to present his father with a sword that had been blessed by use. He promised to wrong no man but to punish any who attacked him.

Near Epidaurus he met Periphetes, the "Club-bearer," who attacked travelers with his bronze club and beat them to death. Theseus seized the club and used it against Periphetes, slaying him. He was then so pleased with the huge club that he kept it as his own and carried it with him ever after, as Heracles had done with his club of olive wood. At the Isthmus of Corinth he came upon Sinis, the "Pine-bender," who compelled travelers to help him bend down pine trees. When, by main strength, Sinis and the traveler were holding the top of the arched tree to the ground, Sinis would let go. Without his strength the tree snapped upright, flinging the traveler into the air and then dashing him to his death on the ground. But some say Sinis bent two trees to the ground, tied his victim to the two trees, then released them. As the trees sprang upright, the victim was torn apart. Theseus slew Sinis by the same means. He found Perigune, daughter of Sinis, hiding in the rushes in terror of him. He persuaded her that he would do her no harm and won her love. She bore him Melanippus. Theseus later gave her to Deioneus of Oechalia. Theseus next slew the Crommyonian Sow, a savage beast said by some to be the offspring of Echidna and Typhon. The animal had been roaming the countryside, terrorizing the inhabitants. This sow, also called Phaea, was said by some not to have been an animal at all, but an evil female robber, whose greed and habits won her the name of sow. Theseus dispatched her and proceeded on his way. At the Megarian cliffs he came upon Sciron, whose custom it was to compel travelers to wash his feet as he sat near the edge of the cliff. As they squatted to carry out his bidding, he kicked them into the sea. Theseus refused to obey him. Instead he hurled Sciron into the sea. But some say it was not on the journey to Athens that he killed Sciron, whom they call an upright man, but later, when he captured Eleusis from the Megarians. Proceeding to Eleusis, he met Cercyon the wrestler and overcame him, not by strength but by skill, as Theseus was the first to understand the principles of wrestling. Next he encountered Damastes, called Procrustes, "Stretchers." He had two beds in his lodging, one short and one long. It was his evil practice to lure travelers to spend the night in his house. Short travelers he placed on the long bed, and stretched them out until they fitted the bed. Tall travelers were given the short bed, and had as much of their limbs lopped off as was necessary to fit them to the bed. But some say Procrustes had only one bed which he used in both manners. Theseus killed him. At the Cephissus River Theseus came to the home of the Phytalidae, the sons of Phytalus. They purified him of the murders he had committed and treated him with courtesy. These were the first on his journey to receive him in a friendly manner. He later rewarded them by making them priests of a temple of Artemis which he raised in Troezen. Proceeding to Athens, Theseus passed an uncompleted temple of Apollo on the outskirts of the city. Masons working on the roof of the temple spied him and jeered his youthful appearance. They pretended they thought he was a girl and coarsely wondered that he should be walking about alone. Theseus made no reply to their taunts. Instead he unyoked an ox from the masons' cart and hurled the animal high into the air above the roof of the temple. Without more ado he went on to find his father's house.

In the years since he had visited Pittheus in Troezen and embraced Aethra, Aegeus had married Medea, the sorceress whom Jason brought back with him from Colchis. She bore him a son, Medeus, and feared that Theseus, whom by her arts she recognized the instant he came to Athens, would displace her son in the affections of Aegeus and as heir to his throne. She plotted to kill Theseus. Aegeus did not know that the youth who appeared before him, and whom he had never seen before, was his own son. Some say that at Medea's suggestion he sent Theseus to capture the Marathonian Bull. This bull had been brought over the sea from Crete by Heracles and was ravaging the countryside. Theseus subdued the bull and dragged it by its horns through Athens and sacrificed it to Apollo. But some say he did this later, after he had been recognized as the son of Aegeus. Medea persuaded Aegeus, who still had not learned that this was his son, that the young stranger was a threat to him. She induced Aegeus to offer him a cup of wine that she had poisoned with aconite. This occurred at a banquet held in the temple on the Acropolis where Aegeus lived. As Theseus lifted the cup to his lips, Aegeus caught sight of the hilt of the sword the young man was wearing. By the serpents twined about the hilt he recognized it as his own sword and realized that this must be his son. He dashed the cup from Theseus' hand. The spot where it fell was afterward barred off in the temple. Aegeus was overcome with joy at this meeting with his valiant son, and all Athens celebrated. Medea, for her plots, was expelled from Athens, and her child with her. The sons of Pallas, brother of Aegeus, claimed that Aegeus was not a true descendant of Erechtheus, and they had been plotting to seize the throne. The arrival of Theseus put their plans out of joint and they resolved to divide their forces and attack the city from two sides. But Theseus was warned of their intentions by the herald Leos. He fell upon one of the forces of the Pallantids and slew them. Those in the other force scattered.

When he had been in Athens but a little while, the time came for the Athenians to send the tribute which King Minos of Crete exacted every nine years with the sanction of the gods, because the Athenians had caused the death of his son Androgeus. This tribute consisted of seven youths and seven maidens who were selected by lot and sent to Crete, there to be devoured by the Minotaur, the monstrous son of Pasiphaë, who was kept concealed in a winding labyrinth. The most common account is that Theseus won the hearts of the Athenians by volunteering to be one of the seven youths. Some say, however, that his lot was drawn; and others say that Minos came from Crete to select the young Athenians himself, and that he instantly chose Theseus. The custom was to send the youths and maidens to Crete in a ship fitted with a black sail as a sign of mourning for the loss Athens suffered. Theseus assured Aegeus that he meant to slay the Minotaur and return. Aegeus gave him a white sail, or as some say, a scarlet one, and instructed him to replace the black sail with it if he was successful in escaping from Crete. Before his departure Theseus made vows and prayers to Apollo at Delphi, and was told by the priestess to take Aphrodite as his guide. When the youths and maidens of the tribute were gathered at the shore, he sacrificed to Aphrodite, and his victim, a she-goat, was transformed into a he-goat as it died. With this favorable omen the Athenians departed. At that time the Athenians were not so skilled at navigation as they were to become later. Theseus took as his pilots for the voyage to Crete Nausithous of Salamis and Phaeax, who some say was the ancestor of the Phaeacians. The Cyberneria, or Pilots' Festival, was afterward celebrated at Phalerum in their honor. When the Athenians arrived in Crete, Minos came down to the shore to look them over. He was favorably impressed by one of the maidens in the group and would have seized her. Theseus sprang forward in anger and forbade him to touch any of the maidens who had been sent as tribute. He said that as a son of Poseidon he would protect the virgins who had come with him to Crete. Minos mocked his claim to be a son of Poseidon. He took a ring from his finger and, hurling it into the sea, commanded Theseus to prove he was a son of Poseidon by retrieving the ring. "First," said Theseus, "prove that you are, as you claim, a son of Zeus." Minos prayed to Zeus for a sign and immediately there was a loud clap of thunder and a flash of lightning. Theseus acknowledged this proof. He leaped into the sea to prove his own claim. A school of dolphins escorted him to the underwater palace of Thetis the Nereid.

Theseus/

She, or as some say, Amphitrite, gave him a jeweled crown and sent out the Nereids to find the ring. When they recovered it, they gave it to Theseus, who then emerged from the sea carrying the ring, which he restored to Minos, and the jeweled crown, which he later gave to Ariadne as a wedding gift. For among those who had witnessed his defiance of Minos over the maiden, and had seen him subsequently leap into the sea and recover the ring, was Ariadne, the daughter of Minos. She fell in love with Theseus on the spot. This was the work of Aphrodite, whom Theseus, as advised, had taken as his guide. Ariadne resolved to save him from death in the labyrinth. She had a ball of magic thread from Daedalus, the builder of the labyrinth, which had the property, as it was unwound, of leading whoever held it to the heart of the labyrinth. By rewinding it one could follow it out of the labyrinth. Ariadne offered to help Theseus in exchange for his promise to take her away from Crete with him as his wife. She gave him the ball of thread, told him to fasten one end of it to the lintel of the labyrinth as he entered and unwind the ball until he came to the Minotaur. To escape from the labyrinth he had only to rewind the thread. He followed her instructions, found and slew the Minotaur, which he offered as a sacrifice to Poseidon, and returned to the entrance where Ariadne awaited him. Together with the Athenians who had accompanied him to Crete, they fled to their ship and escaped. Theseus took the precaution of knocking holes in the hulls of the Cretan ships before he left, and thus the Cretans were not immediately able to pursue them.

The Cretans did not accept this story of the Minotaur, offspring of Pasiphaë and a bull. They claimed there was no such animal, and said that the labyrinth was simply a dungeon where the Athenians were kept until they were either offered as sacrifices at the funeral games for Androgeus, or given as prizes. They said that the most powerful general under Minos was one Taurus (bull). He was a great athlete and bully. According to the Cretans, they held funeral games for Androgeus, at which the prizes were Athenian youths and maidens given to the winners as slaves. Taurus always won. The Cretans resented his prowess and his arrogance. Theseus, coming as part of the tribute, asked permission to take part in the games. Minos, in the hope that he might defeat Taurus and also because he suspected Taurus of carrying on an intrigue with Pasiphaë, gave his consent. Theseus wrestled Taurus and, to the delight of Minos and the watching Ariadne, three times hurled him flat and pinned his shoulders to the ground. Minos was so pleased by the humiliation of Taurus that he released the Athenians, sent them back to Athens with Theseus, and gave him his daughter Ariadne for wife. So much for the Cretan story.

After leaving Crete, carrying Ariadne with him, Theseus put in at the island of Naxos. There, as she slept, he abandoned her. Some say Dionysus appeared to him in a dream and demanded her; others that Athena appeared to him in a dream and warned him to leave her; others that his ship, with him in it, was driven to sea by a storm, and when he returned Ariadne had disappeared. Still others say he abandoned her out of love for a daughter of Panopeus. In any event, he did not take Ariadne to Athens with him. He sailed from Naxos to the island of Delos and dedicated an image of Aphrodite in the temple of Apollo there. Around an altar made of horns taken entirely from the left side of the head he danced the so-called Crane Dance, which in its weavings and circlings imitated the winding passages of the labyrinth. (The Delians continued to perform this dance at least as late as the first century of the Christian era.) In Delos he also instituted athletic contests and established the custom, the first to do so, of awarding the palm to the victor. He then sailed for Attica. Some say it was grief over the loss of Ariadne that caused him to forget to change the black sail. Others say it was jubilation at escaping from Crete and joy at beholding the shores of Attica that made him forget. In any event, Aegeus, anxiously looking out to sea, scanning the horizon for a glimpse of a sail, saw a black sail and read in it a message that his son was dead. In his despair he hurled himself from the Acropolis and was killed, or, as some say, he flung himself into the sea which thereafter was called Aegean in his honor. Theseus landed and sent heralds with the good news to the city. The ship in which he voyaged to Crete, a 30-oared galley, was preserved by the Athenians to the end of the 4th century B.C.

Aegeus being dead, Theseus now became king. He destroyed his enemies and the sons of Pallas, and strengthened the kingdom by incorporating the 12 independent demes into which Attica had formerly been divided into one municipal unit, to which some say he gave the name Athens. He established an orderly democracy in which he was the leader, and divided the citizens into classes, each of which had its own duties and privileges. He was said, incorrectly as it happens, to have coined money, stamped with the image of an ox, to have established the Panathenaic Festival, which was open to all of Attica, and to have added Megara to the control of Athens. When he had done these things he gave up the throne and gave Athens a constitution, for the Delphic oracle now prophesied that Athens could sail the stormy seas with the security of an inflated pig's bladder. Some say the Isthmian Games, previously mysterious rites held at night in honor of Melicertes, came to be held as athletic and other contests in the daytime and in honor of Sciron at the instigation of Theseus. He secured a promise from the Corinthians, where the games were held, that the Athenians should occupy a place of honor equal in area to the space which could be covered by the sail of the ship in which they sailed to the games.

According to some accounts, Theseus accompanied Heracles on his mission to the Euxine Sea to fetch the Amazon's girdle. Heracles gave him the Amazon Antiope as a reward and he returned with her to Athens. But some say Theseus went to the Amazon country after the expedition of Heracles, and captured Antiope himself. At all events, the Amazons marched from the Euxine Sea against Athens to avenge the attack Theseus made on them. The war lasted three months and ended in a treaty. Some say Antiope, who bore Hippolytus to Theseus, was killed in this war, fighting at his side. Others say she was killed later, when Theseus made an alliance with Deucalion, who had succeeded his father Minos as king of Crete. He gave Theseus his sister Phaedra for wife. Antiope, infuriated at being cast aside, burst into the hall where the wedding ceremonies were in progress and threatened to kill Theseus. The doors were hastily closed and Antiope, with her attendant maidens, was killed. Phaedra bore Acamas and Demophon, who took part in the Trojan War, to Theseus. She later fell in love with her stepson Hippolytus and when he repulsed her advances she hanged herself.

Theseus was said to have ravished the daughters of Sinis and Cercyon—his love adventures paralleled those of Heracles; to have married Periboea, who later married Telamon and bore Ajax; to have sailed with Jason in the Argo; to have taken part in the Calydonian Hunt; to have aided the Lapiths in their war with the centaurs; to have recovered the corpses of those who fell at Thebes in the Expedition of the Seven against Thebes; and to have settled a boundary dispute between the Peloponnesians and the Ionians. Indeed, so many were the deeds of Theseus that the expression "Not without Theseus" came into use.

Pirithous, king of the Lapiths, heard such tales of the valor and spirit of Theseus he resolved to test whether he could live up to his reputation. He made a raid on Attica and drove off some of the cattle. Theseus pursued him. Pirithous stopped in his tracks and turned to confront Theseus. He was so impressed by him that he confessed he had done wrong and offered to do whatever Theseus commanded of him. Theseus, equally impressed, asked of him only that he be his friend. At the wedding of Pirithous Theseus helped to subdue the unruly centaurs who attacked the bride. The wife of Pirithous subsequently died. As Theseus was also a widower, he and Pirithous resolved to seek daughters of Zeus as wives. They decided first to abduct Helen, the beautiful ward of Tyndareus of Sparta, although she was but a child (some say ten years old) at the time. They carried out their plan, seizing the youthful Helen as she was sacrificing in a temple, and drew lots to see which would win her for his wife, on the understanding that the winner should then help the loser to find a bride. Theseus won, but as he feared the disapproval of the Athenians, for his act might cause a war with Sparta, he sent Helen away to Aphidna in the care of his mother. Pirithous later reminded Theseus of his bargain, and informed him that he meant to take Persephone from Hades for his bride. Theseus tried to dissuade him from the perilous enterprise of descending to Tartarus to steal Persephone, but Pirithous insisted and Theseus was bound by his oath to help him in the undertaking. They descended to Tartarus through an entrance at Taenarus and demanded Persephone from Hades. He asked them to be seated. The chairs on which they sat were the Chairs of Forgetfulness and at once became part of their bodies. They could not move, and stayed where they were for four years. Then Heracles, in Tartarus to fetch Cerberus, found them and answered their appeal for help. He succeeded in wrenching Theseus off his chair, but he left a good deal of his flesh stuck to the chair, for which reason the descendants of Theseus were noted for their thinly covered buttocks. Heracles, however, could not free Pirithous, and he and Theseus returned to earth without him. Some say this Persephone sought by Pirithous was the wife of one Aidoneus, a king in Thesprotia, and he captured Pirithous and Theseus when they came to steal his wife. He threw Pirithous to the dogs and locked Theseus up in a dungeon, from which Heracles ultimately freed him.

When he returned to Athens after his long stay in Tartarus, Theseus found that the Dioscuri had recovered their sister Helen, and carried her and Theseus' mother off to Sparta, and that Menestheus had seized the throne of Athens. In his absence the people had become corrupt and they did not welcome him on his return. In sadness he went to the island of Scyrus, where he owned estates. Lycomedes, the king, welcomed him and pretended friendship. Under the pretext of pointing out to Theseus where his estates were located, he led him to a cliff, and while his back was turned, he pushed Theseus off the cliff to his death. According to tradition, at the Battle of Marathon (490 B.C.) an image of Theseus in full armor rose up and rushed at the head of the Athenians against the Persians. Afterward the oracle of Delphi ordered the bones of Theseus restored to Athens; Cimon, the Athenian general, went to Scyrus to find them, but the islanders refused to tell him where Theseus was buried. He was led to his grave by an eagle which he saw tearing the earth with its talons. On that spot Cimon dug and found a coffin containing huge bones which he took to be the bones of Theseus. He restored them to Athens, where they were buried in a tomb in the heart of the city. This tomb became a sanctuary for runaway slaves and the oppressed, whom Theseus had always championed. The Athenians worshiped Theseus as the founder of their city and as a hero, but they never succeeded in having him declared a god.

Thesmia (thes'mi-ā). Epithet of Demeter. Trisaules and Damithales, who welcomed Demeter when she came to Arcadia, established her rites and built a temple of Demeter Thesmia (Law-goddess) under Mount Cyllene in Arcadia.

Thesmophoria (thes-mō-fō'ri-ā). Ancient Greek festival in honor of Demeter Thesmophorus (Law-giver), who taught the arts of agriculture, fostered marriage, presided over family life and the birth of children, and initiated civil law. Some say the Thesmophoria had no connection with Demeter as a lawgiver, since the festival had nothing to do with laws, but rather was a fertility ceremony, in which certain sacred objects were "carried and laid down." In this connection, the thes of Thesmophoria is thought to have the same meaning as the thes of Theseus, "tokens deposited," and these tokens were in the main symbols of fertility, of the earth and of man. The festival, which was widespread throughout Greece, was especially important in Athens. It was celebrated by women only (no men were admitted to the rites) from time immemorial, from the 11th through the 13th day of Pyanepsion (October-November). The rites were said to have been introduced to the Pelasgian women by the daughters of Danaus, who brought them from Egypt when they fled to Argos. After the Dorian invasion (c1100 B.C.), the Thesmophoria was not celebrated in Dorian cities. The rites, which were carried on at night by the light of torches, came to be associated with certain incidents concerning the rape by Hades of Persephone and Demeter's search for her daughter. During the Thesmophoria the women celebrants lived in booths and strewed the plant agnus castus on their couches, as this plant was thought to be a specific against snakes. The women who took part in the Thesmophoria had to be free citizens, and it is thought that they had to be married women. Women in whose houses a death had occurred during the year could not take part in the festival as they had been polluted by death. On the first day of the festival, variously called Cathodos (Downgoing) and Anodos (Up-rising), women who had purified themselves for a certain number of days carried pinecones and phallic cakes, both symbols of fertility, and went out to certain chasms or megara (chambers) in the ground. These were considered to be underworld dwellings of Demeter and Persephone. Into them the women cast suckling pigs. The women, on the same day, descended into the chasms, striking bronze gongs or shaking bronze rattles to dispel the snakes that had gathered to feed on the flesh of the pigs, and brought up the rotted remains; presumably, remains of those piglets that had been cast into the chasms the year before. This part of the ritual came to be considered a reënactment of the rape of Persephone, for when Persephone was gathering flowers in a meadow, a swineherd named Eubuleus was tending his swine nearby. The earth parted, Hades emerged and seized Persephone, and descended into the earth again with her through the chasm. The swine of Eubuleus were swallowed up at the same time. The procedure followed by the women was a fertility rite in that the pig was highly regarded as a symbol of fertility and the serpents that ate the remains thereof were sacred spirits of the earth. The second day of the festival was the Nestia, a day of fasting. On this day the rotted remains of the swine rested on the altars. The fast was strictly observed, prisoners were freed, the law courts were closed, and the Boule did not sit. The women fasted sitting on the ground. Contact with the earth was a fertility ritual. The sitting on the ground came to be associated with an incident in Demeter's search for Persephone. When she neared Eleusis, the goddess sat down on the "Laughless" stone, near the "Well of Fair Dances," and grieved for her lost daughter. Thus the Nestia was a day of fasting and grief. The third day of the festival was the Calligenia (Fair-born), when the rotted flesh of the swine was scattered over the fields, for it was believed that if this flesh was mixed with seed, a good crop would follow. The Calligenia was a day of merrymaking and feasting. At Athens the feast was held on the Pnyx. Women refrained from intercourse preceding the festival, ate no pomegranate seeds during it, as the pomegranate was food for the dead, and wore no ornamentation.

Thesmophoriazusae (thes-mō-fō'ri-a-zō'sē), The. Comedy of Aristophanes, presented in 411 B.C. The women of Athens rise up against Euripides because in his tragedies he depicts women as such unpleasant characters. They decide to work out a suitable punishment for him at the Thesmophoria, a festival to which women alone are admitted. Euripides learns of their plot and ardently wishes to have a representative at the Thesmophoria to present his side of the case. His father-in-law Mnesilochus agrees to attend the festival disguised as a woman in order to speak for him. He does so but his disguise is discovered by the women, who turn him over to the authorities for trial on a charge of profaning the festival. Euripides devises a number of schemes, each more ridiculous than the last. From off-stage he hums fragments of his own plays, to which Mnesilochus, under guard on-stage, hums the answers, and thus a plot which results in the escape of Mnesilochus is arranged, and all ends well.

Thesmophorus (thes-mof'ō-rus). Epithet of Demeter. There were sanctuaries of Demeter Thesmophorus (Law-giver) throughout Greece, as in Attica, Megara, Hermione, and Phocis. The sanctuary of Demeter Thesmophorus at Thebes was said to have been the house of Cadmus. The Thebans say that when Alexander the Great was approaching their city, they were warned by a spider which spun a black web across the doorway of the sanctuary. As Thes-mophorus, Demeter presided over and protected the social order, marriage, the family, and childbirth.

Thespieae (thes'pi-ē). A city in Boeotia at the foot of Mount Helicon. It was founded by Thespius, who became its king. Heracles visited the city when he hunted the Thespian Lion. With Plataea it refused to give earth and water to the heralds of Xerxes, and it sent to Thermopylae 700 men who remained and perished with the Spartans. The Thespians fought against the Persians at Plataea in 479 B.C. and against Athens at Delium in 424 B.C. The walls of the city were later destroyed by Thebes. Thespieae was noted for the worship of Eros and the Muses and in it was Eros' most famous shrine.

Thespian Lion. In Greek legend, a lion that roamed the forests of Cithaeron and the glades of Mount Helicon, and preyed on the flocks of Amphitryon, foster father of Heracles. Heracles, as a young man, sought and found the lion. He killed it and wore its skin as a cloak. According to other accounts, it was the skin of the Nemean Lion that Heracles wore, and Alceus was the man who slew the Thespian Lion.

Thespian Maids (thes'pi-an). The Greek Muses. They were so called because their games were performed at Thespieae, at the foot of Mount Helicon.

Thespis (thes'pis). Attic poet; fl. in the middle of the 6th century B.C. He is the reputed founder of tragic drama. It is said that "to rest his dancers and vary the entertainment" he introduced monologues and perhaps dialogues in the dithyrambic choruses, which until then had responded as a unit to the leader. He won his first victory in 534 B.C.

Thespius (thes'pi-us). In Greek legend, a son or descendant of Erechtheus, king of Athens. He was the founder and king of Thespieae in Boeotia, and the father of 50 daughters by his wife Megamede. Being anxious to have descendants by Heracles, he welcomed the hero when he came to Thespieae to hunt the Thespian Lion, and gave him all his 50 daughters. All except one were delighted with Heracles' attentions, and among them produced 51 male children, including two sets of twins. The one daughter who refused Heracles' favors was forced to become a priestess in his temple and was thus condemned to lifelong virginity. Thespius' admiration and friendly relations with Heracles endured. He purified Heracles after the latter, in a fit of madness, had murdered his own sons. Later, at Heracles' order, he sent 40 of his 51 grandsons to colonize the island of Sardinia.

Thesprotia (thes-prō'shā). [Also: Thesprotis.] In ancient geography, a region in SW Epirus, Greece, lying near the sea.

Thesprotus (thes-prō'tus). In Greek legend, a son of Lycaon and king of Sicyon, to whose court Thyestes fled. There Thyestes ravished his own daughter Pelopia who was serving as a priestess. Thyestes then departed. Atreus came to the kingdom and asked for Pelopia in marriage in the belief that she was the daughter of Thesprotus. Thesprotus did not enlighten him as to her origin and, wishing to win the friendship of Atreus, gave her to him in marriage.

Thessalonica (thes'a-lō-nī'kā, -lon'i-kā). [Modern names, Salonika, Salonica, Thessalonika.] In ancient geography, a city and seaport of Macedonia, situated at the head of the Thermaic Gulf (Gulf of Salonika). It was founded, c316 B.C., by Cassander near the ancient city of Therma, which was absorbed by the new city. Cassander named his city after his wife, a sister of Alexander the Great. It became a Roman province in 146 B.C. Owing to its location on the Gulf and also on the Via Egnatia (large sections of which remain in the city), the Roman military road that ran from the coast of the Adriatic to the East, it became a flourishing commercial and intellectual center. Cicero went into exile at Thessalonica, 58 B.C., and Pompey took refuge there briefly after his defeat by Caesar, 49 B.C.

Thessalus (thes'a-lus). In Greek legend, a son of Heracles and Chalcioppe, daughter of Eurypylus of Cos. When Heracles was shipwrecked on Cos at the command of Hera, he was attacked by the natives and had to flee. He disguised himself in women's clothes and successfully evaded his attackers. Later, when he had rested, he fought them and was victorious. He married Chalcioppe, who later bore him Thessalus, subsequently a king in Thessaly. His sons, Antiphus and Phidippus, captained 30 ships against Troy in the Trojan War.

Thessalus. In Greek legend, a son of Jason and Medea. Some say he was stoned to death, along with his sisters and brothers, by the Corinthians to avenge the death of Glauce and Creon, and that he was buried in the sacred precinct of Hera in Corinth. Others say he escaped and went to Iolcus, where he found that Acastus, son of Pelias, had died. Thessalus took over the throne of Iolcus and named the people of the land Thessalians after himself.

Thessaly (thes'a-li). [Also: Thessalia.] District which in ancient times formed the NE division of Greece. It was bounded by Macedonia on the N (separated by a range of mountains including Mount Olympus), the Thracian Sea and Magnesia (or including Magnesia) on the E, Doris and Aetolia on the S, and Epirus on the W (separated by Mount Pindus). Thessaly contained the mountains Ossa, Pelion, and Othrys, and was traversed by the Peneus River that flowed through the Vale of Tempe. According to tradition, it was the original home of the Achaeans who migrated from there to Crete and to other parts of Greece, and laid the foundations for a highly developed civilization which did not, however, take root in Thessaly. The fertile land and location of Thessaly as the entrance to the Greek peninsula from the north attracted frequent invasions. Pelasgians invaded it in the 2nd millennium B.C. They were followed by the Minyans, whose story is told in the legends of Iolcus, Pagasae, and the expedition of the Argonauts. Various other tribes came into the region, including Achaeans from Phthia (part of Achilles' realm), and Boeotians. The men of Thessaly took part in the great united Greek expedition against Troy, Thessalus, a son of Heracles and a king in Thessaly, being one of the leaders of the Thessalians. After the Trojan War the land was invaded by a Dorian people of Epirus, who also claimed descent from Heracles. They were called Thessali, and gave their name to the whole region. The newcomers subjugated and enslaved the people of Thessaly, and established themselves as the military and ruling class. "Horse-breeding" Thessaly made cavalry the backbone of its military establishment. Several powerful families were founded, as the Aleuadae at Larisa and the Scopadae at Crannon. They established oligarchic and aristocratic rule, and democracy was much delayed in the region. Pagasae and Pherae became the seats of powerful lords. In the 6th century B.C. these powerful families united in a loose confederation, which in times of emergency united under a common military commander, called a tagus. The area was divided into four regions: Thessaliotis, centering about Pharsalus; Pelasgiotis, around Larisa; Hestiaeotis, about Triccala; and Phthiotis, about Othrys. In the Persian Wars Thessaly, the gateway to Greece, was pro-Persian, as much from necessity, owing to its exposed position, as from choice. At times the united Thessalian Confederation presented a threat to Phocis and southern Greece, but more often the confederation was weakened by the ambitions of local leaders. Jason, tyrant of Pherae in the 4th century B.C., won domination of the confederation and for a time threatened southern Greece. Whatever his dreams of conquest may have been, they were cut short by his assassination. The Thessalian cities invoked the aid of Macedonia to resist Jason's successor, Alexander of Pherae. They found it no happier to be under foreign rule, and turned to Thebes. For a time Thessaly existed as a Theban protectorate, divided into tetrads, four political divisions based on geographical divisions. In 353 B.C. Philip II of Macedon entered Thessaly, at the invitation of the Thessalians, and subsequently made himself master of it. It remained more or less a vassal of Macedonia until 197 B.C., when it became a protectorate of Rome. Many of the cities of Thessaly, its mountains and valleys, are celebrated in Greek legend.

Theste (thes'tē). Sister of Dionysius the Elder (c430-367 B.C.) of Syracuse. Her husband Polyxenus became an enemy of Dionysius and fled from Sicily. According to Plutarch, Dionysius called his sister to him and chided her because she had not warned him that Polyxenus meant to flee. She retorted that she had not known of it, for if she had she would surely have gone with him and shared his fortunes, as she would far rather be known as the wife of Polyxenus the exile than as the sister of Dionysius the tyrant. sus admired her courage in speaking thus to him, and the Syracusans honored her and continued to give her the services due to royalty even after the dissolution of the tyranny. When she died, all the citizens, so it is said, attended her funeral.

Thestius (thes'ti-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Ares. He was a king in Aetolia and the father of Althaea, who became the wife of Oeneus, and of Leda, who became the wife of Tyndareus. According to some accounts, he also had a son Calydon, whom he killed because he had been charged with incestuous relations with his mother. Thestius later drowned himself in grief and remorse over the death of his son.

Thestor (thes'tor). In mythology, a son of Apollo, according to some accounts; or a son of Apollo's son, Idmon the Argonaut. He was the father of Calchas, to whom he taught the art of prophecy. In later versions of his story he was said to have been the father also of two daughters: Leucippe and Theonoë. Theonoë was kidnapped by pirates, who took her to Caria where she became the mistress of King Icarus. Thestor set out to search for his daughter but was overtaken by a storm and shipwrecked on the coast of Caria. He fell into the hands of King Icarus, who did not know of his relationship to Theonoë, and he was made a slave. Leucippe later sought for news of her father and sister, whom she had not seen since she had been a child. The oracle at Delphi told her to go to Caria, disguised as a priest of Apollo, to search for them. In Caria Theonoë fell in love with the beautiful young priest, but her advances were rejected. Enraged, Theonoë then ordered that one of the slaves should put the young priest to death. Thestor was the slave chosen for the purpose. Thestor confronted the young priest, but instead of killing him, he recited his own name and history and prepared to plunge the sword into his own breast in his misery. Leucippe recognized that this was her father and revealed her true identity to him. Together they then planned to kill the king's mistress. They found her alone in her room and told her to prepare to die. However, before they killed her, they wanted her to know what noble persons she had persecuted. On hearing their names, it was Theonoë's turn to recognize her father, and the family was happily reunited. King Icarus nobly shared their joy. He gave them rich gifts and sent them all home to Greece.

Thetis (thē'tis). In Greek mythology, a sea-goddess, attended by fifty Nereids, the daughters of Nereus and Doris. Zeus fell in love with her and pursued her, but Thetis eluded him, thus earning the gratitude of Hera. Zeus gave up his pursuit, as Poseidon had also done, when he learned from Prometheus that Thetis would bear a son more powerful than his father. He promised her to Peleus, son of Aeacus. Thetis had no desire to marry Peleus, and since she had the power to transform herself at will she endeavored to escape him when he had caught her as she slept in a cave by the sea, by turning herself successively into fire, water, a lion, a serpent, and a fish. Peleus, as he had been warned to do by Chiron, maintained his grasp through these changes and she consented to marry him. All the gods and goddesses were present at their wedding except Eris, who had not been invited because of her disruptive influence, and who threw the Apple of Discord among the wedding guests in revenge. Thetis bore several sons to Peleus. One after the other she immersed them in flames to burn away their mortal parts and sent them to Olympus. Peleus happened in one night while she was performing this rite on Achilles. He screamed at the sight. Thetis dropped Achilles and fled to the sea. Peleus never saw her again, although she sometimes spoke to him and told him what to do while keeping herself invisible. According to some accounts, Thetis dipped Achilles into the River Styx and thus made him invulnerable except for the one place on his ankle where she held him.

On the whole, Thetis was a kindly goddess and rendered service to many of the gods. When Hera, Poseidon, and Athena bound Zeus in 100 fetters, Thetis summoned Briareus, who used his 100 hands to free him instantly. She gave Dionysus asylum beneath the sea when Lycurgus pursued him. She sheltered Hephaestus for nine years when Hera hurled him from heaven because of his lameness. At Hera's request, she lifted the Argo over the dangerous Clashing Rocks and then, with her Nereids, propelled it safely past Scylla and Charybdis. Because of her previous aid, Zeus granted her request to favor the Trojans to punish the Greeks for Agamemnon's insult to her son Achilles in the tenth year of the Trojan War, and Hephaestus willingly made armor for Achilles to replace that which he had loaned to Patroclus and which had been captured by Hector. After the death of Achilles it was Thetis who decreed that this magic armor should be awarded to the bravest of the Greeks. She prophesied accurately that if Achilles went to Troy he would die young; that if Achilles killed a son of Apollo he would die by Apollo's hand; that the first man to go ashore at Troy would be the first to die there.

Thia (thī'a). In Greek mythology, a Titaness, one of the daughters of Gaea and Uranus. By her brother Hyperion she was the mother of Eos (Dawn), Helios (Sun), and Selene (Moon).

Thiasus, Thiasos (thī'a-sus, -sos). A band or company assembled in honor of a divinity; especially, a Dionysiac band or procession in which men and women took part in character, with boisterous mirth and music, and bearing attributes of the god. This term was specifically applied to the mythological band of nymphs, maenads, satyrs, etc., forming the personal followers of Dionysus, and often represented in sculpture and painting.

Thiodamas (thī-od'a-mas). A legendary king of the Dryopians. Heracles, passing through his land, found the king plowing with a yoke of oxen. Since he was hungry Heracles asked for one of the oxen. Thiodamas refused him, whereupon Heracles slew him and took his son Hylas as his squire. He killed and roasted the ox and ate it. Then he drove the Dryopians out of their city on Mount Parnassus and sent the leading citizens as slaves to Delphi. But some say this Thiodamas was a native of Rhodes, and that it was when Heracles was in Rhodes that he seized one of his oxen. Thiodamas fled to a nearby hilltop and from this safe position hurled curses on Heracles. Heracles was unimpressed and ate of the ox, which he had meantime roasted, to his satisfaction. But some say it was from this incident that the custom arose in Rhodes of uttering curses when sacrifices were made to Heracles.

Thirty Tyrants. Aristocratic body which usurped the government of Athens (404-403 B.C.). The most notable was Critias. They were expelled by the democratic party under the lead of Thrasybulus.

Thisbe (thiz'bē). In ancient geography, a city of Boeotia, Greece, named for a local nymph. There was a sanctuary of Heracles here, and the inhabitants celebrated a festival called the Herachia.

Thisbe. See under Pyramus and Thisbe.

Thisoa (thī-sō'a). In Greek mythology, an Arcadian nymph who, according to some accounts, took care of the infant Zeus after he was born on Mount Lycaeus in Arcadia. A city in Arcadia was named for her.

Thoas (thō'as). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a son of Andraemon and Gorge. He was a king in Aetolia after Oeneus and his children had perished. As a former suitor of Helen, he had sworn to give aid to whatever man became her husband in case any difficulty came to him as a result of his marriage, and therefore he led the Aetolians against the Trojans in the Trojan War to restore Helen to her husband. During the war he accepted Hector's challenge to single combat but was eliminated in the drawing of the lots and the honor of fighting Hector fell to Ajax. After the death of Hector he was one of the Greeks who entered Troy in the Wooden Horse.

Thoas or Thoön (thō'ōn). In Greek mythology, one of the Giants, a son of Gaea and the blood of Uranus, who waged war on the gods. In the battle the Fates crushed his head with a bronze pestle and Heracles killed him.

Thoas. In Greek legend, a son of Hypsipyle and Jason, and the twin of Euneus. Other names sometimes given to him are Nebrophonus and Deiphilus.

Thoas. In classical mythology, a son of Ariadne and Dionysus, or according to some accounts, of Theseus. Rhadamanthys of Crete gave him the island of Lemnos for his kingdom. However, the Lemnian women rose against the men of the island and killed all the males. Thoas was saved by his daughter Hypsipyle, who concealed him in a chest and set him adrift on the sea. The chest landed safely on the island of Oenoë and there Thoas became the father of Sicinus by the nymph of the island. Thoas was the king of the Taurians when Iphigenia was brought to Tauris, having been saved by the gods from being sacrificed at Aulis. He made her priestess of Artemis in Tauris. When her brother came to steal the statue of the goddess and discovered that the priestess was his own sister, he suggested that they should kill Thoas and escape with the statue. Iphigenia would not agree to the slaying of Thoas because he had been kind to her. They did escape by a trick and Thoas, in anger, would have pursued and killed them but Athena appeared to him and told him it was the will of the gods that they should go free.

Thoön (thō'ōn). In the Iliad, a Trojan who, with Asius, ignored the advice of Polydamas not to drive the chariots against the Greek wall but to attack on foot. The chariots were successful in getting across the moat but in the press and commotion were unable to maneuver, as Polydamas had foretold, and Thoön was slain by Antilochus.

Thornax (thōr'naks), Mount. Mountain in Argolis. Here, some say, Zeus, in the form of a cuckoo, wooed Hera. She had rejected his advances when he courted her in his own shape, but took the cuckoo and nestled it in her bosom. Zeus thereupon resumed his own shape and ravished her. Afterward, the name of the mountain was changed to Cuckoo.

Thoth (thoth, tōt). [Also: Tat, Tehuti, Thot.]

In Egyptian mythology, originally a moon-god, later the god and inventor of speech and hieroglyphics or letters, of the reckoning of time and measurements, and the god of wisdom. He was the scribe of the gods, and kept the records of the dead in a book, which he read at the time of judgment. The cynocephalous ape and the ibis were sacred to him. He is represented as a human figure, usually with the head of an ibis, and frequently with the moon disk and crescent. In Hellenistic times the Greeks identified him with their Hermes.

Thrace (thrās). [Latin, Thracia; Greek, Thraki.]

In ancient geography, a region NE of Macedonia, extending to the Ister (Danube) River on the N and the Euxine (Black) Sea on the E. As a Roman province it was bounded by the Haemus or Balkan Mountains (separating it from Moesia) on the N, the Euxine Sea and Bosphorus on the E, the Propontis, Hellespont, and Aegean Sea on the S, and the Nestus or Mesta (separating it from Macedonia) on the W. The principal mountain range is the Rhodope; the principal river, the Hebrus (Maritsa). The climate was known for its severity, and the inhabitants for their ferocity and barbarity. Because of the severe climate and the fierce people Thrace was known as the home of Boreas, the North Wind, and the war-god Ares. The aborigines were scattered by invaders, who were in turn replaced by the various tribes called Thracians between 1600-1400 B.C. The affinities of the ancient inhabitants are unknown; they may have been ancestors of the Wallachs. The wide stretch of country between the lower course of the Ister and the shores of the Aegean and the Propontis was occupied in ancient times by the tribe of the Thracians, which Herodotus regards as the greatest of all peoples next to the Indi. The scanty remains of the Thracian language are enough to establish traces of its Indo-Germanic character, but not enough to define its position in the Indo-European family more closely. Certain it is, however, that from hence a large part of Asia Minor received its Indo-European-speaking population. In the first place, it is known that the Thracians themselves spread eastwards over the strait a considerable distance towards Asia. According to the unanimous opinion of antiquity, again, the Phrygians emigrated from Europe, and were originally connected with the Thracians. According to Greek legend, Orpheus, Linus, and Musaeus came from Thrace. In the Trojan War the Thracians, under their prince Rhesus, were allies of King Priam. From the 8th century B.C. the Greeks visited Thrace, and planted colonies at Byzantium, on the Chersonesus Thracica (Gallipoli Peninsula), and at Abdera, Perinthus, and elsewhere. Darius the Great invaded Thrace and when he withdrew he left his general Megabazus there and the latter subdued the region. The Thracian Greeks furnished 120 ships and many foot soldiers to the armament Xerxes led into Europe in 480 B.C. And it was in Thrace, at the mouth of the Hebrus River, that Xerxes reviewed his vast army, as enumerated by Herodotus. After the defeat of the Persians the Athenians dispersed the Persian garrisons Xerxes had left in Thrace. In the middle of the 5th century B.C. Teres, king of the Odrysae, the most powerful of the Thracian tribes, brought most of Thrace under his rule. During the Peloponnesian War, Sitalces, son of Teres, supplied Athens with troops and invaded Macedonia to little effect. The Spartan general Brasidas made an unsuccessful attempt to win the Athenian cities on the coast of Thrace. In the 4th century B.C. an alliance between Athens and Thrace proved ineffective. Philip II of Macedon won control of the area c340 B.C. Following the death of Alexander the Great, Thrace became for a time part of the dominion of Lysimachus, and then fell to Macedonia. With the defeat of the Macedonian king Perseus (168 B.C.), Thrace became independent under the protection of Rome, and subsequently, a Roman province.

Thrasybulus (thras-i-bū'lus, thrā-sib'ū-lus). A 6th century B.C. tyrant of Miletus under whose rule the city prospered greatly, and who planted colonies of Miletus on the Euxine Sea. He successfully resisted the threats of the kings of Lydia. According to Herodotus, in the 12th year of a war with Alyattes, king of Lydia who had inherited the war from his father, Alyattes invaded Miletus and set the grain afire, as he had been doing annually. A gale of wind swept the fire to the temple of Athena at Assesus and burned it to the ground. Afterward, Alyattes fell sick and sent to inquire of the oracle at Delphi how he might be cured. His messengers were told by the priestess that she would not answer his inquiries until the temple of Athena at Assesus was rebuilt. Periander of Corinth, a friend of Thrasybulus, heard of the oracle and sent word of it to Thrasybulus, that he might be prepared. Therefore, when Alyattes sent heralds to Thrasybulus to arrange a truce during which the temple could be rebuilt, the heralds were met by a startling sight. Thrasybulus, foreseeing that Alyattes would send to him as a consequence of the oracle, had caused all the grain that was in the city to be brought into the market-place, and had ordered the people to set to feasting and revelry when he gave the signal. When the heralds arrived, they found the Milesians enjoying themselves as if there had never been any war at all, and amusing themselves in the market-place, surrounded by an abundance of grain. The heralds immediately reported this to Alyattes and he, who had thought that by this time the Milesians would have exhausted their supplies and be glad of a truce, on learning of the plenty they still enjoyed, instead of offering a truce made peace with Thrasybulus and ended the long war. After this Alyattes rebuilt the temple of Athena and recovered from his sickness. One of the reasons for the friendship of Thrasybulus and Periander was advice he had given Periander when the latter became ruler of Corinth. Periander sent a messenger to him, to ask what sort of government he should establish. Thrasybulus took the messenger into a wheat field, and as he talked, kept breaking off the heads of the tallest stalks and throwing the ears on the ground, but he never answered the question the messenger had brought from Periander. On his return to Corinth the messenger reported that he had no answer from Thrasybulus, and described his strange conduct in the wheat field. But Periander understood the meaning of his actions, and immediately sought out the leading men of his realm and destroyed them.

Thrasybulus. Athenian commander and statesman; killed 388 B.C. In 411 B.C. he was at Samos with the Athenian navy, and persuaded the sailors there to rise against the oligarchy of the Four Hundred that was governing at Athens, and to proclaim their allegiance to the democracy. Under his direction the Assembly that had been abolished at Athens was revived at Samos. He secured the return to Samos of Alcibiades and had him elected general. In 410 B.C. he commanded one division of the fleet that defeated the Spartans at Cyzicus. Following this, and other Spartan defeats, the Four Hundred at Athens were overthrown. Athens enjoyed some successes in its war with Sparta, but was ultimately defeated at Aegospotami (405 B.C.). Under the protection of the Spartan general Lysander, an interim body of 30, later known as the Thirty Tyrants, was chosen to govern Athens. Thrasybulus was driven into exile with other democrats. The exiles took refuge at the fortress of Phyle in Attica and resisted an army sent against them by Athens. In 403 B.C. Thrasybulus burst out of Phyle with the exiles and seized Munychia at the Piraeus. This led to the overthrow of the Thirty Tyrants and the reestablishment of Athenian democracy. Thrasybulus aided Thebes against Sparta in 395 B.C., and commanded with great success in the Aegean Sea in 390 B.C. He was killed in his tent at Aspendus in Pamphylia by natives who were outraged by the violence of his soldiers.

Thrasydemus (thras-i-dē'mus). In the Iliad, a Lycian, also called Thrasymelus, the squire of Sarpedon. He was slain by Patroclus. Sarpedon received a mortal wound from Patroclus in avenging his death.

Thrasyllus (thra-sil'us). Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian War; put to death 406 B.C. He opposed the oligarchs in 411 B.C., and helped to overthrow them. He was one of the commanders at Cynossema in 411 B.C., and was a general at Arginusae in 406 B.C. and one of those who was executed for permitting the crews of sunken ships to drown rather than breaking off the pursuit of the enemy to rescue them.

Thrasymedes (thras-i-mē'dēz). In Greek legend, a son of Nestor who accompanied his father to Troy and was a chief of the Greek sentries. He furnished his sword, shield, and bull-hide helmet to Diomedes when the latter went as a spy against the Trojan camp. With his father he battled against Memnon for possession of the body of Antilochus, his brother, but both were forced to withdraw. He fought bravely throughout the war and at its close returned safely to Pylus with his father. Telamachus met him there when he visited Nestor in search of news of his father.

Three Graces, The. See Graces, The Three.

Three Horatii (hō-rā'shi-i), The. See Horatii, The Three.

Thriae (thri'i). In Greek mythology, three nymphs of Parnassus who nursed Apollo. They were seeresses who foretold the future by casting pebbles in water. At the request of Apollo they taught Hermes how to foretell the future by this method.

Thriambus (thri-am'bus). An epithet of Dionysus, applied to him because he was the first to celebrate a triumph.

Thronium (thrō'ni-um). In ancient geography, a city in the Ceraunian Mountains, settled, according to tradition, by Locrians from Thronium on the river Boagrius and by Abantes from Euboea, who, in eight ships, were driven to this place by a storm on their way home from the Trojan War. They named the land about their new city Abantis. Later, they were expelled from their city by their neighbors of Apollonia, a colony of Corcyra.

Thucydides (thū-sid'i-dēz). Greek historian; born c460 B.C.; died c401 B.C. He was a native of Athens, belonged to a family which claimed blood relationship with Miltiades and Cimon, is said to have been a pupil of Antiphon of Rhamnus and of Anaxagoras, and possessed an ample fortune, part of which was invested in gold mines in Thrace, where he held a hereditary chieftainship. In 424 B.C. he was appointed general and was sent to Chalcidice. Brasidas, the Spartan general, was operating in Thrace and threatening Amphipolis. Thucydides had removed the squadron under his command to Thasus, where, some said, he owned gold mines. Brasidas made a forced march through the snow and won Amphipolis before Thucydides, to whom word had been sent, could arrive and protect the city. Thucydides withdrew to Eion on the Strymon River, which he defended from attack by Brasidas, but because he had failed to prevent the capture of Amphipolis, he went into exile; whether this exile was forced or voluntary is unknown. He returned to Athens 20 years later in 403 B.C. He was commonly supposed by the ancients to have died a violent death soon after, probably at Athens. Thucydides was a soldier and a typical Athenian, with the most vibrant interest in the political life of his city. He was an ardent admirer of Pericles. The abrupt end of his military career in no way lessened his interest in the course of the war; it did permit him to take a broader view of its overall course, and to study it with the most intense interest. In the first book of his History of the Peloponnesian War he austere warns, perhaps as a thrust at Herodotus, that "The absence of romance in my history will, I fear, detract somewhat from its interest; but if it be judged useful by those inquirers who desire an exact knowledge of the past as an aid to the interpretation of the future, which in the course of human things must resemble if it does not reflect it, I shall be content." He clearly states his intention of applying the most rigid critical tests to his material to ensure that the truth will be uncovered, and he rather grandly pronounces that, "I have written my work, not as an essay which is to win the applause of the moment, but as a possession for all time." As to the real cause of the war, "the one which was formally most kept out of sight," it was, he says, "the growth of the power of Athens, and the alarm which this inspired in Lacedaemon." He proposed to recount the history of the war in sequence, by summers and winters, and he adhered to his plan. By the device of speeches put into the mouths of various participants in the war he characterized men and nations as he presented in this manner the conflicting claims of allies and adversaries. Of these speeches he says, "some were delivered before the war began, others while it was going on; some I heard myself, others I got from various quarters; it was in all cases difficult to carry them word for word in one's memory, so my habit has been to make the speakers say what was in my opinion demanded of them by the various occasions, of course adhering as closely as possible to the general sense of what they really said." Having announced his method and stated his aim, he set to work and with admirable lack of passion carried out his purpose. The History which he produced is analytical and political, as distinct from the earlier histories which evolved in consequence of the original meaning of the word history, "a learning or knowing by inquiry." The History breaks off in the twenty-first year of the war, 411 B.C. The last book, the eighth, contains none of the famous speeches and lacks the literary finish of earlier books, indicating that Thucydides did not have a chance to revise it.

Thurii (thū'ri-i). [Also: Thurium.] In ancient geography, a city in Magna Graecia, Italy, situated near the ancient Sybaris and near what is now Terranova di Sibari. It was founded (452 B.C.) by fugitives from Sybaris who were soon expelled by Croton, and was refounded (c443 B.C.) by colonists from Athens and other cities. Hippodamus of Miletus was said to have drawn the plans for the Athenian colony, and the historian Herodotus was one of the colonists. It was defeated (390 B.C.) by the Lucanians, called Rome to its aid against Tarentum in 282 B.C., and later was subject to Rome. It was plundered (204 B.C.) by Hannibal, and was later the site of a Roman colony.

Thyestes (thī-es'tēz). In Greek legend, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, and the brother and arch-rival of Atreus. Thyestes and Atreus fled from their home in the Peloponnesus because they were implicated in the murder of their half-brother Chrysippus. They were invited to Mycenae by Sthenelus, who had seized the throne there. When Sthenelus and his son Eurystheus were dead, an oracle proclaimed that Mycenae should be governed by a Pelopid. The question was whether it should be Atreus or Thyestes. In the rivalry between the brothers Zeus took the part of Atreus; Artemis favored Thyestes. Thyestes, who had become the lover of Aërope, wife of Atreus, now induced her to steal a golden-fleeced, horned lamb that Atreus possessed. It had been sent to him by Hermes, to increase the enmity between the brothers and thus to punish the Pelopids for the murder of Myrtilus by their father Pelops. Atreus had sacrificed the flesh of the lamb to Artemis in accordance with a vow, but had kept the fleece, stuffed it, and kept it hidden away in a chest. Once Thyestes had it in his possession, he claimed that the throne of Mycenae should go to whoever held the golden-fleeced lamb. Atreus, under the impression that the lamb was safely in his possession, was agreeable. It then developed that Thyestes, thanks to Aërope's treachery, had acquired the lamb. He would immediately have been made king but for the intervention of Zeus. The god sent Hermes to ask if Thyestes would withdraw in favor of Atreus if the sun reversed its course through the heavens. Thyestes agreed, and Zeus for one day caused the sun to go backwards across the sky. Atreus became king and Thyestes was banished. According to some accounts, Thyestes avenged himself by causing Atreus to kill Plisthenes, his own son by his first wife, under the impression that Plisthenes, who had been brought up by Thyestes, was the latter's son. When Atreus learned of Aërope's adultery with Thyestes, he sent for Thyestes on the pretext that he was willing to share his kingdom with him. When he arrived, Atreus seized his three sons—Aglaus, Orchomenus, and Callileon—from the altar of Zeus where they had fled for refuge. He cut off their limbs and boiled their bodies in a cauldron. He then invited Thyestes to a feast. Only when the banquet was over did Atreus order the bloody limbs of Thyestes' sons brought in to reveal to their father that he had eaten of his own sons' flesh. Sickened with horror, Thyestes pronounced a fearful curse on the house of Atreus, which brought disaster to his sons, and fled to Sicyon. There, in accordance with instructions from an oracle, he ravished his daughter Pelopia. She did not know his true identity, and in her struggle to escape seized his sword. Atreus came to Sicyon looking for Thyestes. He saw Pelopia and fell in love with her. Since he had killed

Aërope for her infidelity, he asked the king of Sicyon, who he thought was Pelopia's father, for permission to marry her. The king did not enlighten him as to her parentage, but gladly gave his permission. Later Pelopia bore Thyestes' son, Aegisthus. Atreus thought this was his own child, and rescued him when Pelopia left him on a mountain to die. Some years later, famine afflicted Mycenae. Atreus sent his sons, Agamemnon and Menelaus, to fetch Thyestes. They found him and brought him to Mycenae. Atreus imprisoned him and ordered young Aegisthus to kill him as he slept. But Thyestes awoke, recognized the sword which Aegisthus held unsteadily over him, and asked where he had found it. Aegisthus said his mother had given it to him, and Thyestes realized that this was his own son. He sent for Pelopia, who plunged the sword into her breast on learning that the father of her child was her own father. Aegisthus took the bloody sword to Atreus as proof that Thyestes was dead and, as Atreus thankfully sacrificed near the sea, Aegisthus and Thyestes set upon him and killed him. Thyestes at last became king of Mycenae. When he died, he was buried near the shrine of Perseus outside Mycenae, and a ram was placed over his tomb. None of this complicated horror story for control of Mycenae appears in Homer. In the Iliad, the scepter, made by Hephaestus, was given by Zeus to Pelops; Pelops bequeathed it to Atreus, who in turn passed it to Thyestes, and he handed it over to Agamemnon.

Thyia (thī'ā). In Greek mythology, a daughter of the river-god Cephissus according to some accounts. Others say Castalius, a mortal, was her father. She was the mother by Apollo of Delphus, who gave his name to Delphi. Since she first sacrificed to Dionysus at Delphi and celebrated revels in his honor, her name was given to the followers of Dionysus, who were called Thyiades. The Delphians raised an altar in the sacred precinct of Thyia in gratitude to the winds that helped them in the Persian Wars by causing great storms that scattered the Persian fleet at Artemisium.

Thymbraeus (thim-brē'us). In Greek legend, one of the twin sons of the priest Laocoön. He was sometimes known as Melanthus. See Antiphas.

Thymbrius (thim'bri-us). In ancient geography, a small river near Ilium (Troy).

Thymele (thim'ē-lē). In Greek antiquity, an altar; particularly, the small altar of Dionysus which occupied the central point of the orchestra of the Greek theater, and was a visible token of the religious character of the dramatic representations. Literally, "a place for sacrifice."

Thymoetes (thī-mē'tēz). In Greek legend, an elder of Troy and a counselor of Priam. His son Munippus, by Cilla, sister of Priam, was born earlier on the same day that Hecuba bore Paris to Priam. According to a prophecy, the royal Trojan who bore a son that day must be destroyed, along with her child; otherwise the child would bring ruin to Troy. Priam took the prophecy to apply to Cilla and her son, and had them both killed. Many years later, after the death of Hector and Penthesilea at the hands of Achilles, Thymoetes advised the Trojans to flee their doomed city, as Achilles was irresistible. His advice in this instance was disregarded. However, when the Wooden Horse was discovered before the gates of Troy, Thymoetes advised, either from treachery in revenge for the death of Munippus, or because Troy's fate was already sealed, that the Trojans bring it inside the walls. This time his advice was heeded and brought disaster to Troy.

Thymoetes. In Greek legend, a son of Oxyntes; he was the great-grandson and last descendant of Theseus. He became king of Athens by murdering his brother. During a war he was challenged by the leader of the enemy to fight a duel to decide the contest. Thymoetes refused to accept the challenge. Melanthus, a Messenian exile, accepted the challenge and killed his opponent, and after this he replaced Thymoetes as ruler of Athens.

Thynias (thī'ni-as). A small desert island near the Bosphorus in the southern part of the Euxine Sea. According to legend, here the Argonauts stopped on their way to Colchis and here Apollo appeared to them at dawn in a blaze of glory. On the advice of Orpheus they sacrificed a wild goat to Apollo on an altar which they erected, and took an oath never to desert one another in time of danger. This oath was commemorated by a temple to the goddess Harmonia or Concord which was later raised on the island. Thyone (thī'ō-nē). The name that was given to Semele when she was translated to Olympus from Tartarus. Dionysus gave his mother this name so that the ghosts who were left in Tartarus would not be jealous that she had escaped.

Thyoneus (thī-ō-nē-us). An epithet of Dionysus, meaning "Son of Thyone," which was the name given to his mother Semele when she ascended to Olympus and became immortal.

Thyrsus (thēr'sus). One of the most common emblems of Dionysus and his thiasus and votaries. It was a staff tipped with an ornament like a pine-cone and sometimes wrapped round with ivy and vine branches, and appears in various modifications in ancient representations. The bacchantes carried thyrsi in their hands when they celebrated their orgies.

Tiber (tī'bēr). [Also: Tiberis, Tiberinus, Tibris, Tybris; modern name, Tevere.] Second longest river in Italy. It rises in the Apennines about 20 miles NE of Arretium (Arezzo), flows generally S, and empties into the Mediterranean about 16 miles SW of Rome, which is on its banks. Its chief tributaries are the Clanis (Chiana), Nar (Nera), and Anio (Aniene).

Tiberinus (tī-bēr-ī-nus) or Tiberius (tī-bir'i-us). In Roman legend, a king of Alba Longa. He was drowned in the Albula River which was then renamed Tiber for him. In Roman mythology the god of the Tiber River, worshiped at Rome, was also called Tiberinus. The river-god appeared to Aeneas as he was worrying, on the eve of the war with Turnus, and told him not to give up. He advised Aeneas to locate his city on a spot where he would find a white sow with 30 piglets, and told him he would find the sow on the banks of the Tiber under some oak trees. He also advised Aeneas to go to Evander for help in his war. The 30 piglets of which Tiberinus spoke indicated that after 30 years Ascanius, son of Aeneas, would found the white town of Alba.

Tiberius/

Caesar.] Second Roman emperor, born Nov. 16, 42 B.C.; died March 16, 37 A.D. He was a member of the ancient patrician Claudian family whose ancestors, according to some accounts, had come from the Sabine country to Rome in the time of Romulus. Others say the Claudians came to Rome in the 6th century B.C. His father was Tiberius Nero, who had been a quaestor and had been a commander of Caesar's fleet. His mother was Livia Drusilla, a woman of great force and ambition, and the intelligence to pursue it. Some say Tiberius was born at Fundi, but most say he was born on the Palatine Hill. His birth took place during the disorders that followed the assassination of Caesar, when Octavian, the future Augustus, had not yet consolidated his power. According to a tale told by Suetonius, Livia sought to foretell the sex of her unborn child by warming an egg in her hands. She and her handmaids kept the egg warm until it hatched; a strong cock with a spectacular comb emerged from the shell and foretold the greatness of her as yet unborn son. In his youth an astrologer was similarly encouraging, saying he would be a king without a crown. The childhood of Tiberius was extremely unsettled, as his parents were continually fleeing before the displeasure of Octavian. Tiberius Nero had turned against Caesar, even proposing that his assassins should be rewarded, and he sided with Mark Antony in his early bid for power. When Antony was reconciled with Octavian, Tiberius Nero returned to Rome (39 B.C.) with his family, and his mistaken enthusiasm for republican government was forgiven by Octavian. This forgiveness may have been prompted by the fact that Octavian saw Livia and fell in love with her. Though she had borne one child, Tiberius, and was about to produce another, Octavian compelled Tiberius Nero to divorce her and immediately made her his own wife (38 B.C.).

The young Tiberius began to appear before the public at an early age. He delivered his father's funeral oration at the age of nine. He was quaestor, praetor, and consul, each time before he was old enough legally to occupy the offices. He appeared as an advocate and as prosecutor before the Senate, fought against the Cantabrians in Spain, led an army to Armenia (20 B.C.), where he restored the king as a vassal of Rome, and served as governor of Transalpine Gaul (19 B.C.). In 15 B.C. he went with his brother Drusus to subjugate the Germans at the source of the Rhenus (Rhine) and the Ister (Danube). In 11 B.C. he carried on a successful campaign against the Pannonians. This was followed by other successes in Germany. Augustus appointed him tribune for five years in 6 B.C. Suddenly he decided to retire from public life. He gave as his reason his unwillingness to appear to compete for popular favor with Caius and Lucius, the grandsons of Augustus, who had now come of age. Livia, to whom no children had been born of her union with Augustus, tried to persuade him not to retire. Augustus refused to consent to his retirement, for following the death of Drusus, Tiberius was the most capable commander of the Roman armies. Tiberius went on a hunger strike in order to gain his wish, and at the end of four days Augustus reluctantly gave him leave to depart. He went to Rhodes, which he remembered from a previous visit as an idyllic spot. Some say his ardent wish for self-imposed exile came from his bitterly unpleasant marriage. He had first married Vipsania Agrippina, the daughter of Augustus' good friend and military commander, Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa. With her he was happy; she bore him a son, Drusus. When she was about to bear their second child, Augustus ordered Tiberius to divorce his beloved wife and marry his daughter Julia (12 B.C.). It was said that when afterward Tiberius happened to see Vipsania in the street, tears came into his eyes and he followed her with such a look of unhappiness on his face that Augustus arranged it so that he would never lay eyes on her again. After his forced marriage to Julia her licentiousness became increasingly flagrant, and since he could not divorce her, Tiberius at last got off to Rhodes leaving Julia and his son Drusus behind. In Rhodes he lived quietly. When he learned that Julia had been banished by her father for her adulteries, he asked permission to return to Rome. Augustus now refused it, and as his influence waned alarmingly, Tiberius came to be known as "the Exile." He continued to make application to Augustus for his return. Livia added her pleas, and Augustus was persuaded to change his mind. The message that he could return having been received, Tiberius set out for Rome (c2 A.D.), after an absence of seven years. Within three years of his return Caius and Lucius, natural heirs of Augustus, had died. Augustus adopted him and Agrippa Postumus (his last remaining grandson) as his sons (4 A.D.). Agrippa Postumus was accused of plotting against Augustus and was banished. Tiberius became the heir apparent.

For the next years he led the armies. He pacified Germany. Next he went to Illyria to suppress a revolt. The war was hard-fought and long. After three years he was victorious. This success was particularly important to Tiberius and to Rome, for it came at the time (9 A.D.) when the loss of Varus with three legions in Germany had plunged all Rome into mourning. From Illyria he went to Germany to salvage what he could from the defeat of Varus. On his return from Germany he celebrated a belated triumph for his Illyrian victory. He gave a great banquet with 1000 tables laid for his guests, and gave each man present three pieces of gold. Under customary procedure, Bato, the defeated Illyrian leader, would have been strangled. In a rare instance of magnanimity, Tiberius made him rich presents and gave him a house in Ravenna, because once during the war Bato had had the Romans trapped in a gorge and allowed them to escape rather than defeat them in an unequal fight. Tiberius used the spoils of the Illyrian war to restore the Temples of Concord and of the Heavenly Twins (Castor and Pollux). When Augustus was in his last brief illness, he summoned Tiberius to his side. Some said Augustus made Tiberius his heir partly at the insistence of Livia, but mostly because all his natural heirs, save Agrippa Postumus, were dead. And some say among Augustus' last words were these, "Alas, poor Rome, doomed to be chewed by those slow-moving jaws." Tiberius' enemies said Augustus never liked him. On the other hand, it appears that Augustus admired his military skill, and felt that he would be able to protect Rome from her enemies.

Tiberius did not immediately reveal the death of Augustus. First, Agrippa Postumus must be disposed of. Whether Livia or Tiberius gave the order for his death is not known, but when it was announced to him, Tiberius had the man who had carried out the order executed. He then went to the Senate to announce the death of Augustus. He asked for the protection of a Praetorian Guard for his person and assumed imperial powers, although he did not take the title of emperor. His assumption of power did not take place with unanimous approval. The soldiers in Germany clamored for Germanicus, their general, to take power, but he rebuked them and honorably refused to take advantage of their enthusiasm and affection. Other abortive plots against Tiberius were easily crushed. Tiberius conducted himself modestly as supreme ruler, although there was never any doubt as to who held the power. He refused to allow his followers to dedicate temples and priests to him as a divine being. He restored the authority and dignity of the consuls, and preserved the forms of republican government. He made some attempt to elevate the moral tone of life among the upper classes of Rome, which had become increasingly dissolute. He tried to control high prices with price ceilings, and limited to some extent the expense of public shows. An ardent student of Greek and Roman literature himself, he encouraged literature. He undertook tax reforms that greatly strengthened the financial condition of Rome. He abolished the ancient right of sanctuary and temples and also abolished foreign cults, especially those of the Egyptians and the Jews; it was in his reign that Christ was crucified. Remaining in Rome, he yet kept his generals and governors in the outposts on the alert by his frequent announcements that he was about to visit them, even going so far as to order transportation and food for his train. Then he would cancel the journey. He did this so many times he was given the nickname "Callipedes," from an actor whose specialty it was to give an imitation of a runner while never moving from one spot.

he went to the island of Capreae (Capri), and remained there almost uninterruptedly until his death. Tiberius had never been popular at Rome. He was harsh and often cruel, as were his immediate predecessors, but unlike them, he apparently had no avenue to the affections of the people. In his days at Capreae he acquired a hideous reputation for the most grossly immoral practices and for savage cruelty, according to the Roman biographers who exaggerated and preserved his reputation for evil. He seemed to become indifferent to affairs of state, and carried them out by correspondence. He had always been considered stingy. He now became rapacious, confiscating estates at will and with almost no excuse. He was relentless toward his ex-wife Julia, and refused to ameliorate the harsh conditions of her exile. He quarreled with his mother, did not attend her funeral, refused to allow her to be deified, and annulled her will. He cared so little when his son Drusus died, so it is said, that when a delegation from Troy came, a month or so later, and offered him condolences, he replied by offering them condolences for the loss of their own eminent citizen, Hector. Some say he arranged to have Germanicus, his nephew and adopted son, and a very popular general, poisoned. He exiled Agrippina, wife of Germanicus, and had her flogged so severely she lost an eye, but he could not prevent her from starving herself to death. He accused the sons of Germanicus, his adoptive grandsons, of plotting against him and ordered them starved to death. The youngest son of Germanicus, Caius, called "Caligula," he spared. When apprised of the hatred and contempt in which he was held by the Romans, he said, "Let them hate me, so long as they fear me." He made his favorite, Sejanus, commander of the Praetorian Guard, and gave him unlimited power to punish his enemies, but when Sejanus began to acquire a following in his own right, Tiberius had him killed (31 A.D.). He rewarded informers and inflicted punishments indiscriminately. His reign, according to unfriendly Roman writers, was one of terror, and he was as much terrified as anyone, fully aware of his many enemies. He kept himself barricaded on Capreae. Suetonius tells that once he left the island and started for Rome. On the journey a pet serpent that he fed with his own hand was found nearly devoured by ants. Soothsayers told him it was a sign he must "beware the power of the mob." He started back to Capreae at once. He dreamed (still according to Suetonius), that a statue of Apollo he was planning to dedicate in the library of a temple of Augustus appeared to him and said, "Tiberius will never dedicate me." A few days before he died, the lighthouse at Capreae was struck by lightning. These signs of imminent death were fulfilled on March 16, 37 A.D., when he died at Misenum. News of his death, which some said was caused by poison administered on the order of Caius Caligula, provoked an outburst of joy. He was succeeded by Caius.

Tibris or Tybris (tī'bris). An ancient name of the Tiber.

Tibullus (ti-bul'us), Albius. Roman elegiac poet; born c54 B.C.; died 19 B.C. Although his family had lost considerable property in the civil wars, Tibullus was left with enough to live in comfort on his estate between Tibur and Praeneste. He was patronized by Messalla, who invited him to accompany him on a campaign in Aquitania, 31 B.C. Out of love for "Delia," he refused a later invitation by Messalla to go on a campaign in Asia. The works ascribed to Tibullus consist of four books, of which Books I and II, indubitably by Tibullus, include poems to his fickle mistresses "Delia" (Planitia?) and "Nemesis." The six elegies which constitute Book III are by "Lygdamus," pseudonym of a fashionable poet of lesser talents, and Book IV contains six elegant short poems by the poetess Sulpicia, seven poems probably by Tibullus, and the anonymous and tasteless Panegyricus Messallae. Tibullus was much admired for his skill in verse and the graceful style in which he depicted the themes of love and the pleasures of country life. (JJ)

Tibur (tī'bér). [Modern name, Tivoli.] In ancient geography, a town in C Italy, situated on a height above the falls of the Anio River, about 15 miles E of Rome. It was

fat, fâte, fâr, fâre, errant; net, mē, hér ardent; pin, pîne; not, nôte, möve, nôr,

an ancient town of the Latins. Under the Romans it continued to flourish, and was especially known as a resort and celebrated for the picturesque Falls of the Anio. Tibur is also notable for two interesting temples of the republican period, a round temple of Vesta and a rectangular temple, sometimes attributed to Hercules, or to the Sibyl, for many centuries used as a church. At the foot of the hill are extensive deposits of the fine water-laid limestone known by the Romans as lapis Tiburtinus, in English as travertine, and at a little distance are sulphurous warm springs, the Aquae Albulae of the Romans, and the extensive remains of the villa of the emperor Hadrian. (JJ)

Tichomachia (tī'kō-mā-kē'a). Literally, "battle at the walls, assault," a name given to the 12th book of the Iliad. (JJ)

Ticinus (ti-sī'nus). [Modern name, Ticino.] River in Switzerland and Italy, formed by the junction of two headstreams flowing from the Alps. It traverses Verbanus Lacus (Lago Maggiore) and the Lombard plain, and joins the Po near Pavia.

Ticinus, Battle of the. Victory gained near the Ticinus (modern, Ticino River) and probably near Pavia, 218 B.C., by Hannibal over the Romans under Publius Scipio; chiefly a cavalry engagement.

Tifata (tī-fā'tā). [Modern name, Monte di Maddaloni.] Low mountain range near Capua, Italy, about 17 miles NE of Naples. Near it, in 83 B.C., Sulla defeated the Marian general Norbanus.

Tifernum Tiberinum (ti-fēr'num tib-ē-rī'num). In ancient geography, a city in Italy, on or near the site of the modern Città di Castello, about 20 miles from Arezzo.

Tigranes (tī-grā'nēz). King of Armenia; died after 56 B.C. He was a son-in-law of Mithridates the Great. He conquered Syria and part of Asia Minor, but was defeated by Lucullus in 69 B.C., surrendered to Pompey, and was deprived of his conquest.

Tigris (tī'gris). [Biblical name, Hiddekel.] River in Mesopotamia (modern Asiatic Turkey and Iraq) which is formed by headstreams that rise in the mountains of Armenia and Assyria, and flows S and SE to the Persian Gulf. The ancient cities of Nineveh, Calah, and Ctesiphon, among others, were on it. According to Greek legend to account for the name of the river, Dionysus crossed it on a tiger's back.

Figurini (tig-ū-rī'nī). One of the branches of the ancient Helvetii. They took an active part in the defeat of the Romans in 107 B.C., but were overwhelmingly defeated by Caesar in 58 B.C. Their capital may have been on the site of modern Zurich.

Timaeus (tī-mē'us). Greek Pythagorean philosopher of Locri in Italy; fl. c400 B.C. He was long reputed to be the author of a philosophical work entitled On the Soul of the World, but scholars now generally agree in assigning the work to a later period. He appears in Plato's dialogue named for him.

Timaeus. Greek historian; fl. c356-260 B.C. He was a native of Tauromenium in Sicily, a member of a noble and wealthy family. He was banished by the tyrant Agathocles in 317 or 312 B.C., and went to Athens where he remained until the last years of his life, before returning to his native country. He wrote a history of Italy and Sicily, in 38 books, from the earliest times to 264 B.C. His work was highly regarded for the care with which he used existing authorities, including Carthaginian and Phoenician archives. Fragments of the work are extant.

Timandra (tī-man'drā). According to some accounts, a daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, and the sister of Helen and Clytemnestra. Because Tyndareus once forgot to make proper sacrifices to Aphrodite, the goddess resolved to punish him by making all his daughters notorious adulteresses. She was first married to Echemus but deserted him to go off to Dulichium with Phyleus.

Timanthès (ti-man'thēz). According to Pausanias, an Olympic victor in the pancratium. He tried to maintain his strength by bending a great bow each day. When he found he could no longer bend the bow, he lighted a fire and cast himself into it.

Timanthès. Greek painter of Sicily; born in the island of Cythnus in the Cyclades; fl. c400 B.C. He is known mainly as the painter of one of the great pictures of antiquity, the Sacrifice of Iphigenia, in which Agamemnon conceals his uncontrollable grief by covering his head with his mantle. This picture was a favorite of Cicero. Pliny's remark that there is "always something more implied

Timocreon (ti-mok'rē-on). Greek poet of Rhodes; fl. first half of the 5th century B.C.; a contemporary of Simonides of Ceos. He is known for his bitter attacks on Themistocles and Simonides. Simonides wrote his epitaph, as follows: "Here lies Timocreon of Rhodes, who drank much, ate much, and said many evil things."

Timoleon (ti-mō'lē-on, tī-). Greek general and statesman, born at Corinth; died 337 or 336 B.C., at Syracuse. He was the son of Timodemus, of an illustrious Corinthian family. Timoleon was noted as a great patriot, for his mild and gentle disposition, for his hatred of tyrants, and for his personal courage. To illustrate his various characteristics—once in battle his brother, pierced by many wounds, fell and was in imminent danger of death. Timoleon rushed to his side, held his shield over his brother to protect him, and warded off the enemy until help arrived. This same brother afterwards got command of a body of mercenaries and threatened to make himself tyrant. Timoleon tried to reason with him and to persuade him not to attempt despotic power but failed to deter him and was mocked for his pains. Timoleon went with two companions to his brother's house, withdrew to a corner of the room, covered his head and wept while his companions, according to plan, assassinated his brother. Those who admired Timoleon credited him with putting his country before his family. His mother, however, did not take this view. Her anger at Timoleon so depressed him that he was only with difficulty persuaded not to starve himself to death, and he withdrew from public life. For the next 20 years he lived in obscurity.

When Dionysius the Younger, exiled tyrant of Syracuse, returned after ten years and re-established himself as tyrant, the Carthaginians threatened Syracuse. The Syracusans sent to Corinth, their mother-city, for help. As the Corinthians, having decided to send help to their colony, debated who should be put in command of the expeditionary force, someone proposed that Timoleon be named. He was given the appointment and had begun collecting his forces when a letter from Hicetas, tyrant of Leontini, arrived, saying there was no need to send forces to aid Syracuse as he had been appointed general by the Syracusans. His letter angered the Corinthians, who suspected a design to make himself tyrant of Syracuse, and made them more than ever eager to send Timoleon. A force was outfitted. When they were ready to sail, the priestess of Persephone dreamed that the goddess and her mother were preparing for a journey and said they were going to sail with Timoleon. Because of this favorable omen the Corinthians equipped a sacred trireme and named it for the goddesses. Timoleon went to sacrifice at Delphi before his departure. As he did so a crown that had been presented as a votive offering slipped from its place and fell on his head, indicating that he had been crowned by the god himself. These were the first of many omens noted by Plutarch, that showed Timoleon to be under divine protection. He set sail (344 B.C.) with ten ships to relieve Syracuse. Before Timoleon reached his destination, he learned that Hicetas had besieged Dionysius in the citadel of Syracuse and had made a treacherous agreement with the Carthaginians to prevent Timoleon from coming to the aid of Syracuse. Envoys of Hicetas met him at Rhegium, which, having thrown off its tyrant, welcomed him warmly. But 20 Carthaginian ships, sent thither by Hicetas, lay at anchor in the harbor. Timoleon understood that this was a threat, and realized that Hicetas and the Carthaginians meant to divide Sicily between them. As he could not pass by the Carthaginian fleet, he asked the envoys from Hicetas, who carried orders to him to return to Corinth, to present their proposals to him in a public meeting within the gates of Rhegium. The envoys agreed; the Carthaginians, the envoys, and the people of Rhegium went into the market-place. The gates were closed and speeches were begun. Timoleon, with the help of the Rhegines, delayed the proceedings with many speeches and counter-proposals. While he did so, nine of his ships quietly sailed past the unattended Carthaginian fleet. When word was brought to him of their escape, Timoleon slipped through the crowd, boarded the last of his ships, and sailed away. The Carthaginians, noted for their duplicity, were deeply chagrined at the trick Timoleon had played on them, and the people of Rhegium were delighted that the Carthaginians had been beaten at their own game.

Timoleon and his fleet put in at Tauro-menium, whose ruler, Andromachus, hated tyranny and allowed him to use the city as a base. Hicetas sent the Carthaginian ships to Syracuse. Timoleon set out for Adranum where he met the forces of Hicetas that had come to meet him. While the ranks of Hicetas were still coming up, Timoleon attacked and routed them, though they were vastly superior in numbers. The people of Adranum came streaming out of the city to welcome Timoleon, of whose success they had had divine warning: the doors of the temple of Adranus, the Sicilian fire-god, had flown open of themselves, the spear of the god trembled, and sweat poured off the face of the image, all of which portended wonderful victories. After this victory the other Greek cities of Sicily, which had hitherto distrusted him and feared he wanted to make himself tyrant, flocked to Timoleon's side, and his forces were greatly increased. Dionysius, still shut up in the citadel at Syracuse, sent a message offering to surrender to him. Timoleon secretly sent 400 of his soldiers, all he could safely get through the enemy lines, to accept his surrender and take him off the island citadel. Timoleon shipped him to Corinth and his men took possession of all the stores, horses, and men that Dionysius had left in the citadel. Now the situation at Syracuse was this: Timoleon's men occupied the citadel; the forces of Hicetas occupied the mainland city and territory of Syracuse; and the Carthaginian fleet was in the harbor. Timoleon himself was at Adranum. Hicetas sent two men to assassinate him as he made a sacrifice at the altar. As they were about to attack him, a man in the crowd leaped at one of the would-be assassins and killed him, crying out that he had just recognized him as the man who had slain his father. The other assassin confessed the plot and all marveled at the manner in which the gods protected Timoleon. After the failure of the plot, Hicetas invited Mago, the Carthaginian commander, with 60,000 troops into the city of Syracuse, which had never fallen to Carthaginian attack but was now handed over to them. Hicetas continued to besiege Timoleon's men in the citadel. In an attempt to prevent the besieged from receiving supplies, he went with Mago to take Catana, which was sending food to the citadel by small boat. Timoleon's commander in the citadel sallied out in their absence and seized the strongest part of the city as well as stores of supplies and arms. On the accomplishment of this, and perhaps because he feared that the Greeks might unite against him, Mago decided to leave Sicily and abandoned Hicetas. Timoleon jeered at the cowardice of the Carthaginians, attacked Hicetas, and took the city by storm without losing a man. He destroyed the island citadel that had been the refuge of tyrants, and on its site raised courts of justice. Italy and Greece rang with his fame and the glory of his success. After the wars and sieges, Syracuse was sadly depopulated. Timoleon sent to Corinth to ask for colonists. Many came, and the city began to revive.

The Carthaginians, smarting under the cowardice of Mago, now sent a force of 70,000 under Hasdrubal and Hamilcar to attack Timoleon. With his force of 5000 foot-soldiers and 1000 horse, he marched to meet the enemy. Some of his mercenaries deserted on the way because they had not been paid and because they thought it was folly to attack such an overwhelmingly superior force, but others joined him. On the march his army met some mules loaded with parsley. His soldiers were made uneasy by this because of the association of parsley with the dead. Timoleon heartened them by saying the material of victory crowns had come to them of its own accord, for victors at the Isthmian Games at that time were crowned with parsley. He took some of it and made a wreath for his own head, and his men followed his example. Coming up to the Crimisus River, he saw that the Carthaginians were crossing it. A torrential rain and hail storm, with flashes of lightning and peals of thunder, greatly impeded the Carthaginians with their heavy armor. As they crossed the river Timoleon fell on them and slaughtered them by the hundreds (341 B.C.). Some say 10,000 were killed. The spoils were so great it took his men three days to collect them all and raise their victory trophy. The most beautiful of the captured armor was sent to Corinth to be dedicated in the temple of Poseidon. The defeated Carthaginians sailed away under command of Gisco. Timoleon pursued Hicetas and captured him alive in the land of Leontini. Hicetas and his sons were put to death. The wives and daughters of Hicetas and his friends were brought to trial in Syracuse and, with no opposition from Timoleon, they also were put to death. The Carthaginians sued for peace, and now for a time the sieges and wars ended. Timoleon freed the other Greek cities from their tyrants; Greek Sicily was restored to order, its lands were repopled, and its cities revived. Timoleon, having accomplished what he had set out to do, voluntarily laid aside the great powers that he had exercised. He remained in Syracuse, where he was honored as a common father by the Syracusans. In his old age he went blind, but the Syracusans did not falter in their gratitude to him and their affection and honor for him. Occasionally he was brought into their assembly to hear a debate. After listening carefully he would pronounce his opinion on the proper course to follow and the Syracusans took his advice. After a brief illness, he died (337 or 336 B.C.), was given a great public funeral, and his ashes were buried in the market-place. Timoleon, of excellent character, unusual capacity, and incorruptible patriotism, was one of very few whose ventures were so unfailingly rewarded with success that it was commonly believed that the gods had a special love for him and protected him.

Timomachus (ti-mom'ā-kus). Painter, of Byzantium, fl. in the 1st century B.C. According to Pliny, Julius Caesar paid a large sum for two of his pictures, an Ajax and a Medea. The Medea of Timomachus was not less praised in song and epigram than the Aphrodite of Apelles (an echo of the original may perhaps be seen in some of the Pompeian wall paintings). His Iphigenia in Tauris and a Gorgon were also celebrated.

Timon (tīmōn). A semi-legendary Athenian misanthrope; fl. in the last part of the 5th century B.C. Disillusioned by the disappointments he received, he won a place in history by withdrawing from the society of men. He is the subject of the tragedy Timon of Athens by Shakespeare.

Timon of Phlius (flī'us). Greek Skeptic philosopher; fl. c280 B.C. He wrote satiric poems called Silloi (hence he was called "the Sillographer"), in hexameter verse, ridiculing all the dogmatic schools of philosophy. Fragments of his poems survive.

Timotheus (ti-mō'thē-us, -moth'ē-us; tī-). Athenian naval commander; son of Conon; died, 354 B.C. He was an able commander who did much to restore the power of Athens after the Peloponnesian War. He made an expedition around the Peloponnesus in 376 B.C., and achieved some successes, the most important of which was to win Corcyra for Athens. He was ordered back to Athens on the conclusion of a peace with Sparta, 374 B.C. In his next command he was hampered by lack of money. The Athenians had voted certain measures to relieve Corcyra, which had been attacked by Sparta after Timotheus left, but had not voted the money to carry them out. Timotheus was compelled to lose valuable time collecting money and ships. When he returned from a cruise about the Aegean for this purpose he was accused of fraud, was relieved of his command and subjected to trial. Thanks to the intervention of Alcetas, king of Epirus, and Jason of Pherae, whom he had persuaded to join the second Athenian Confederacy, he was acquitted. But he was discredited in Athens and left to enter the service of the king of Persia. He later returned to Athens and was sent as leader of an expedition against Samos, which he captured, 365 B.C. He next was given command of the fleet that was operating off Macedonia and won great success in the area; he compelled Methone and Pydna to join the Athenian Confederacy, and won Potidaea, Torone, and other cities, but was unsuccessful in two attempts to take Amphipolis. In 356 B.C. he was one of three commanders sent to subdue rebellious Chios. He and Iphicrates, a co-commander, decided not to press the attack because of a violent storm. Chares, the third commander, attacked against their advice and without their support and was driven off with great loss. He accused Timotheus and Iphicrates of treachery. They were brought to trial on a charge of having accepted bribes from the Chians. Iphicrates was acquitted but Timotheus, who had made enemies by his arrogant manner, was fined 100 talents. Unable to pay such a large sum, he withdrew to Chalcis and died soon after. Afterward the Athenians regretted their harsh treatment of Timotheus and allowed his son to settle the fine for 10 talents. Timotheus was buried in the Ceramicus; statues in his honor were set up in the market-place and on the Acropolis.

Timotheus. Dithyrambic poet of Miletus; died c360 B.C. He made some innovations in the theater, in which he was encouraged by Euripides, and in music. Among other things, he increased the number of strings of the cithara to eleven.

Timotheus. Greek sculptor, probably from Epidauros; fl. 4th century B.C. He is best known as the oldest of the four sculptors (the others being Scopas, Leochares, and Bryaxis) who created the Mausoleum, the tomb of Mausolus, satrap of Caria, at Halicarnassus, which was completed c333 B.C. The relief panel of the Amazon frieze from the southern face is attributed to Timotheus. It is thought that he also contributed sculptural ornamentation to the Temple of Asclepius at Epidauros.

Tinia (tin'i-a). Chief god of the ancient Etruscan pantheon. He is equated with the Greek Zeus in that he was both supreme deity and thunder-god. His attribute was the triple thunderbolt, and any spot struck by him became sacred.

Tiphys (tī'fis). In Greek legend, a son of Hag-nias of Boeotia. He was a skillful navigator. At the urging of Athena he joined the Argonauts and became their steersman by common consent. He steered the Argo through many perilous seas but did not reach Colchis. In the land of the Mariandyni he died after a short sickness.

Tiresias or Teiresias (tī-rē'si-as). In Greek mythology, a son of Everes and the nymph Chariclo. He was a blind Theban seer, whose very long life was three times as long as that of an ordinary man's, or, as some say, lasted for seven generations. His mother was the intimate companion of Athena. According to some accounts, when Tiresias was a child he was roaming the forests one day and chanced to go to the Hippocrene Spring on Mount Helicon to drink. At the moment when he arrived there, Athena and Chariclo were bathing in the pool. Athena laid her hand across his eyes, or some say splashed water into them, and blinded him because he had seen her in her bath. Chariclo chided the goddess for blinding her son. Athena answered that it was not by her will but by the law of the gods that whoever saw them without their permission would be blinded. To atone somewhat for the loss of his sight Athena gave him the gift of prophecy and divination, a long life, and the power to retain his mental accomplishments in the Underworld. Or as some say, she caused serpents to cleanse his ears so that he could understand the talk of prophetic birds. Quite another account of how Tiresias became blind has to do with the anger of Hera. According to this account, Tiresias once saw two snakes coupling on Mount Cyllene in Arcadia. He wounded them or, as some say, killed the female, and instantly he was transformed from a man to a woman. For seven years he lived as a woman and was notorious for his love affairs. At the end of that time he again saw two snakes coupling and, as some say, killed the male and was transformed once more into a man. Hera and Zeus, being engaged in an argument about which sex enjoys the physical aspects of love more, decided to consult Tiresias, who had experienced these aspects as both a man and a woman. Hera maintained that the male derived the most pleasure from love-making, and contended that this was why Zeus was so often unfaithful to her. Zeus mocked her and claimed that it was the female who enjoyed it most. On being appealed to, Tiresias agreed with Zeus. If the parts of the pleasure of love were counted as ten, he said, women got nine parts and men only one. This infuriated Hera and she struck Tiresias blind. Zeus, to make up for this, gave him long life and the art of soothsaying. But some say he was blinded because he revealed things to men that only the gods should know. In the reign of Oedipus and Jocasta a plague struck Thebes. Tiresias said it would cease only when the murderer of Laius, Jocasta's former husband, was found actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; ċ as d or j, š as s or sh, t̃ as t or ch, z̃ as z or zh.

and punished. As no one knew who that murderer was Tiresias was at length compelled to inform them that it was Oedipus himself, who had unwittingly murdered his father and sired children on his mother. In the war of the Seven against Thebes, Tiresias predicted to Eteocles, a son of Oedipus who now ruled in his father's place, that Thebes would be victorious if a son of the royal house voluntarily sacrificed himself to Ares. Menoeceus, son of Creon, killed himself and the Seven were routed. Of the seven attacking leaders only Adrastus survived. Ten years later the Epigoni (sons of the Seven against Thebes) attacked the city to avenge their fathers. This time Tiresias advised the Thebans to negotiate with the Argives and to flee the city, for, he said, Thebes would fall when the last of the original seven died, and Adrastus was even now dying of grief over the death of his son Aegialeus who had fallen before Thebes. The Thebans fled and the city fell, as Tiresias had predicted. But Tiresias did not escape with the Thebans. He knew he was fated to die when Thebes fell into the hands of the Argives. As he drew water to drink from a spring, he suddenly died. Tiresias was the father of Manto, a prophetic daughter who was taken by Alcmaeon in the war of the Epigoni and later was sent to Delphi. Some say he had another daughter, Daphne, who became a Sibyl. Tiresias predicted that Narcissus would have a long life, if he never knew himself. According to some, he foretold the heroic exploits of Heracles to Alcmena when Heracles, as an infant, strangled the serpents Hera had sent to kill him. Odysseus, long prevented from returning home after the Trojan War, was instructed by Circe to go to Hades and consult Tiresias to learn the fate that awaited him when he reached his homeland of Ithaca. Tiresias told him Poseidon was angry over the blinding of Polyphemus and would cause him much trouble. He warned Odysseus not to eat the cattle of the sun on Trinacria, told him of the wooers who were besieging Penelope in Ithaca, and said he would avenge their insolence. He also instructed him to seek a land where the men knew not the sea, and told him how he would recognize this land. There he must make sacrifices to Poseidon, after which he could dwell in Ithaca in peace. He also told Odysseus that death would come to him from the sea. All that he predicted came to pass.

Tiro (tī'rō), Marcus Tullius. Roman freedman and amanuensis of Cicero; fl. in the 1st century B.C. He is said to have contributed to the development of the art of stenography.

Tiryns (tī'rinz). In ancient geography, a city in Argolis, Greece, situated near the coast SE of Argos, and about three miles N of Nauplia. According to tradition, the region was first occupied by Pelasgians, who fell under the domination of Danaus when he came to Argolis from Egypt with his 50 daughters. Following internecine wars, the kingdom of Danaus was divided among his descendants. Acrisius became ruler of the region of Argos and his brother Proetus became king of the area about Tiryns and founded the city. According to legend, he imported Cyclopes from Lycia to build its "Cyclopean" walls of enormous, irregular stones. Perseus, having accidentally slain his grandfather Acrisius, thus fulfilling an oracle, did not care to remain in Argos. He exchanged his kingdom with his cousin Megapenthes for Tiryns and removed to Tiryns with Andromeda, the wife he brought home from his adventures in Asia and Africa. Some even say Perseus was born in Tiryns, and point to an underground chamber there as the place where his mother Danaë was confined and was visited by Zeus in a shower of gold. Heracles was compelled to carry out his 12 labors for its king, Eurystheus. Some say the chamber was one Eurystheus caused to be dug and that he used it as a place in which to hide rather than face the terrifying Heracles when he returned to Tiryns to report on the successful conclusion of his various labors. After the death of Eurystheus, Tiryns, like the rest of Argolis, fell under the domination of Atreus, son of Pelops, who had made himself master at Mycenae. With the Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus Tiryns recovered its independence from Mycenae. In the Persian Wars Tiryns sent 200 men to the Battle of Plataea (479 B.C.). Their names were inscribed on the tripods dedicated at Delphi in celebration of the Greek victory. In 468 B.C. Argos, jealous of the honor paid Tiryns for its part in the Persian Wars, in which

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, möve, nōr,

Argos had played no heroic part, conquered Tiryns and destroyed the city.

The city was built on a low rocky hill that rose above the plain of Argos. The ancient city, occupying the hill and the area of the plain at its base, was older than Mycenae, and dates from the 3rd millennium B.C. After 2000 B.C. the citadel on the summit of the low rock was enclosed by walls, within which remains of a pre-Mycenaean palace have been found. Tiryns is celebrated for its antiquities, including Cyclopean walls, gates, and the palace (excavated by Heinrich Schliemann and Wilhelm Dörpfeld, 1884-85). The citadel is a famous memorial of early Greek civilization. The massive walls, built of great blocks, some of which weigh as much as 13 tons, with the interstices filled with small stones, surround the summit of an oblong hill. In the Iliad Homer speaks of Tiryns as "mighty of ramparts." Pausanias, who visited it in the 2nd century A.D., said it was unnecessary to go to Egypt to see the pyramids when there were such wonders as Tiryns at home. The acropolis at Tiryns is divided into three terraces, of which the highest was occupied by the palace and royal quarters, and included the well-known galleries of arcades resembling pointed arches. These galleries gave on to chambers constructed in the thickness of the walls and were unique in Greek architecture. They were used as storage areas in time of peace and as armories and places of shelter in time of war. The middle terrace, north and west of the royal quarters, reinforced the acropolis and was occupied by those connected with the royal household. To the north, and separated by a wall, was the lower terrace where the garrison was quartered, and to which the population of the city at the base of the hill withdrew in times of invasion. As at Mycenae, the principal approach to the acropolis was by a passageway made of enormous blocks of stone, more carefully dressed and fitted than the surrounding walls, and was so placed that the right, or unshielded, side of an approaching enemy was exposed to the defenders in the citadel. Within the walls of the acropolis there are remains of an extensive prehistoric palace, with outer and inner courts, men's apartments, bathroom, and secluded women's quarters, the whole corresponding with the spirit of the Homeric picture. The floor plan of the palace is still plainly visible. A cistern and remains of a drainage system have been found at Tiryns, as well as a royal altar surrounded by a ditch into which the blood of sacrificial victims flowed. Wall paintings and other details of high interest were found by Schliemann.

Tisamenus (ti-sam'e-nus). In Greek legend, a son of Orestes and Hermione, daughter of Helen. He was ruler of Sparta and was slain by the descendants of Heracles when they attacked his country. According to other accounts, he was not killed by the Heraclidae but lost his life when he was driven out of Sparta and sought to conquer regions in the northern part of the Peloponnesus.

Tisamenus. In Greek legend, a son of Thersander (one of the Epigoni). He accompanied his father to Troy and assumed command of the Boeotians when he came of age.

Tisamenus. According to Greek tradition, an Elean, a seer of the family of the Iamidae. He consulted the oracle at Delphi to learn why he had fathered no children. The priestess told him he would win five glorious victories. Tisamenus thought she meant he would win five victories in the games, and set to work to perfect himself in the Pentathlon. At the Olympic Games he won four of his contests but lost the fifth, the wrestling match. The Spartans concluded that the priestess had meant that Tisamenus would win five victories in battle; they therefore sought to hire his services in their wars. Tisamenus, seeing how much they desired him, agreed to help them if they would admit him on equal terms as a Spartan citizen. The Spartans considered this too high a price to pay and refused. But when they were threatened with the danger of the Persians in the Persian War they approached him again and agreed to make him a citizen. Now Tisamenus raised his price: the Spartans must also give the citizenship to his brother. Because of their great need the Spartans agreed; Tisamenus and his brother became the only men, according to Herodotus, whom the Spartans ever admitted to citizenship. With his prophetic powers Tisamenus helped the Spartans to win five victories: at Plataea (479 B.C.); near Tegea (473 B.C.) against the Tegeans and Argives; at Dipaea (c471 B.C.) against the Arcadians; against the Messenians (464 B.C.); and at Tanagra (457 B.C.) against the Athenians and the Argives.

Tisander (ti-san'dēr) or Tisandrus (-drus). In Greek legend, a son of Jason and Medea. Some say he was murdered by his mother for revenge on Jason when the latter proposed to abandon her and marry a Corinthian princess. Others say Tisander, with his brothers and sisters, was seized and stoned to death by the people of Corinth in revenge on Medea for the death of the Theban princess Glauce and her father Creon. The body of Tisander was buried in Hera's sacred precinct in Corinth by order of the priestess of Delphi.

Tisiphone (ti-sif'ō-nē). In Greek mythology, one of the three Erinyes (Furies) or Eumenides, born of the blood of Uranus which fell on Gaea when Cronus mutilated him. She is the "Avenger" who scourges the guilty in the Underworld who have escaped punishment for their crimes while on earth. Tisiphone also responds to the requests of the gods to implant envy and jealousy in the hearts of mortals. Aeneas saw Tisiphone, dressed in a blood-stained robe and sitting on a crag, when he journeyed to the Underworld to visit his father.

Tisiphone. According to Euripides, a daughter of Alcmaeon and Manto the daughter of the seer Tiresias, who had been taken captive by Alcmaeon in the capture of Thebes by the Epigoni. Alcmaeon gave Tisiphone to Creon, king of Corinth, to bring up, after he had sent Manto to Delphi as part of the booty taken at Thebes. Tisiphone grew up to be a beautiful girl. The wife of Creon, fearful lest her husband become enamored of the girl's beauty, sold Tisiphone as a slave. The purchaser, unaware of her identity, was her father Alcmaeon.

Tissaphernes (tis-ā-fēr'nēz). Persian satrap; executed c395 B.C. He became satrap in Asia Minor (413 B.C.). As an enemy of Athens, he stirred up revolt (412 B.C.) of the Athenian cities of Asia Minor and made an alliance with Sparta. He was hostile to Cyrus the Younger, and discovered and disclosed the latter's plans to Artaxerxes II. He took part in the battle of Cunaxa (401 B.C.), in which Cyrus was killed, and acted as guide to the Ten Thousand Greeks during the early part of their return journey from Cunaxa. In the course of the march Tissaphernes gathered the Greek generals and captains of the Ten Thousand in his tent, treacherously had the captains slain and sent the generals in chains to the Persian court, where they were put to death. He was appointed chief ruler in W Asia by Artaxerxes, was defeated by Agesilaus of Sparta in 395 B.C., and was put to death through the influence of Parysatis, who blamed Tissaphernes for the death of her son Cyrus.

Titan (tī'tan). In classical literature, the sun personified. The name Titan was often substituted by the Latin poets for Helius as god of the sun.

Titane (ti-tā'nē). In ancient geography, a town between Sicyon and Phlius in the region of Corinth, Greece. The inhabitants claimed that it was the place where Titan, brother of Helius, first lived and that it was named for him. At Titane there was a sanctuary of Asclepius, built by a son of Machaon after the Trojan War. In the temple were images of Asclepius, Hygea, Coronis, and others. During sacrifices to Asclepius, in which a bull, a lamb, and a pig were offered, the image of Coronis was removed to another part of the temple. Sacred serpents lived in the temple and were fed by the worshipers. There was a temple of Athena on the hill at Titane. At the bottom of the hill was an altar of the Winds. One night a year the priest offered sacrifices to the winds. He performed secret rites, including, some say, the charms of Medea, at four pits near the altar to quell the blast of the winds in the coming year.

Titania (ti-tā'ni-ā). A poetical epithet applied to Diana, Latona, Pyrrha, and Circe.

Titans (tī'tanz). In Greek mythology, the sons of Gaea and Uranus. They were Oceanus, Coeus, Hyperion, Crius, Iapetus, and Cronus. Their sisters, the Titanesses, were Tethys, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, and Thia. Their descendants were also called Titans. Gaea incited them to make war on Uranus. They dethroned him and made Cronus ruler in his place. When Zeus succeeded Cronus, the sons of Iapetus, led by Atlas, made war on Zeus. After a long

struggle, during which the Titans fought from Mount Othrys and the gods fought from Mount Olympus, Zeus secured the aid of the Cyclopes and put the Titans to rout. He hurled them all except Atlas into Tartarus and set the Hecatonchires to guard them. But some say they were banished and at length joined Cronus in the Isles of the Blest.

Titaresius (ti-tä-rē'si-us). In ancient geography, a river of Thessaly, called by Homer a branch of the dread river of oaths, the Styx. The seer Mopsus lived near its banks.

Tithonus (ti-thō'nus). In Greek mythology, a son of Laomedon, and a brother of Priam, king of Troy. Eos fell in love with his youthful beauty and carried him off. He became the father of two of her sons, Memnon and Emathion, and settled in the east. Toward the end of the Trojan War Priam bribed Tithonus with a golden vine to send his son Memnon to the aid of the Trojans. This led to Memnon's death. Eos beseeched Zeus to grant immortality to Tithonus. Zeus granted her request, but as she had forgotten to ask for perpetual youth for him, Tithonus grew older and older, and finally shriveled up so that there was not much more left of him but a chirping voice. Eos shut him up in a chamber and he was transformed into a grasshopper.

Tithorea (ti-thōr'ē-ā). In ancient geography, a city of Phocis, on the slopes of Mount Parnassus. When the sun was passing through the constellation Taurus, the Tithoreans went to Thebes with the aim of stealing earth from the tomb of Amphion and Zethus there. They did this in accordance with an oracle of Bacis, which said that if they took earth from the tomb of Amphion and Zethus and placed it on the tomb of Antiope, Tithorea would have a good harvest and Thebes would not. Naturally, the Thebans wished to prevent such an outcome, and set a guard about the tomb of Amphion and Zethus at this time.

Titias (tish'i-as). In Greek legend, a champion boxer of the Mariandyni. On his return from the expedition to the Amazons Hercules came among the Mariandyni and took part in the funeral games for the king's brother. He sparred with Titias and accidentally killed him.

Titinius (tī-tin'i-us). Latin writer of comedies, an older contemporary of Terence; fl. first half of the 2nd century B.C. Fragments of 14 plays indicate his interest in the everyday life of his time.

Titthium (tit'thi-um). Mountain near Epidaurus where, according to some accounts, Asclepius was exposed by his mother Coronis, and where the herbs are still noted for their medicinal powers. According to a story told by the Epidaurians, a goatherd on the mountain, noticing that his bitch and a she-goat were missing, went in search of them and found them taking turns nursing an infant. He thought to approach the child, but as he did so a bright light shone all about it. This was a sign to the goatherd of the presence of a divinity and he left the child to the protection of the god who had made the sign.

Titus (tīt'us). [Full name, Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus.] Roman emperor; born 39 A.D.; died September, 81 A.D. He was the son of Vespasian. He was called "the delight of mankind" because of his free distribution of gifts to his people. He was educated with Britannicus, served in the army, conducted the Jewish war after the departure of his father, and in 70 A.D. captured Jerusalem, for which he was given a triumph at Rome and in honor of which his brother Domitian erected the Arch of Titus. He was associated with Vespasian in the government, and succeeded to the throne on Vespasian's death, June, 79 A.D. Though dissipated in his habits before he became emperor, he devoted himself thereafter to bettering the lot of the Romans. He finished the Flavian Amphitheater ("Colosseum") and built the Baths of Titus. The eruption of Vesuvius that buried Pompeii, and a fire at Rome, occurred in his reign. On his death he was succeeded by his brother, the cruel and tyrannous Domitian.

Titus Livius (liv'i-us). Latin name of the Roman historian Livy.

Titus Quintius (or Quinctius) Flamininus (kwin'shus, kwink'shus, fla-mi-n'us). See Flamininus, Titus Quintius (or Quinctius).

son of Zeus and Elara. Zeus hid Elara in a cave to protect her from the wrath of Hera, and there her son was born. A cave in Euboea was named the Elarium in her honor. When Tityus grew up Hera incited him to attack Leto. As she was on her way to Delphi, she withdrew to perform some private rite and Tityus assaulted her. As he seized her veil she cried out, and her children, Artemis and Apollo, instantly came to her aid and killed Tityus with their arrows. Because he had had the presumption to attack one of the immortals Tityus was sent to the farthest reaches of Tartarus. There he was stretched out (his body covered nine acres) and pegged down, and vultures were sent to peck at his heart continually. Aeneas saw the awful punishment of Tityus when he visited the Underworld, and the distinguished painter Polygnotus depicted it in his painting of Odysseus in the Underworld, in the hall of the Cnidiads at Delphi. The tomb of Tityus, a rounded barrow, was shown in Phocis, and in Euboea he was worshiped as a hero and had a shrine.

Tivoli (tē'vō-lē). See Tibur.

Tlepolemus (tle-pol'e-mus). In Greek legend, a son of Heracles and Astyocheia, and a grandson of Zeus. As a youth he accidentally killed his father's maternal uncle Lycymnius, whom he loved dearly, and was forced by the other sons and grandsons of Heracles to flee. He built a fleet and, after many hardships, landed with his followers in Rhodes, where he founded cities and married Polyxo. As an ally of the Greeks he captained nine ships in the Trojan War. In the war he encountered Sarpedon, son of Zeus, and taunted him with a lack of courage, saying he could not really be the son of Zeus. He then attacked him and although he succeeded in wounding Sarpedon he was slain by the latter.

Tleson (tlē'son). Attic potter of the 6th century B.C., who specialized in small cups. A group of these cups is known as the Little Master cups from the exquisite miniature paintings on them. The decorator of Tleson's cups worked in the black-figure style and is known as the Tleson Painter. A cup (British Museum) from the third quarter of the 6th century B.C. shows an almost prancing hunter, accompanied by his dog, carrying small animals on a pole slung over his shoulder. It is signed, "Tleson, son of Nearchus, made." Another cup (Metropolitan Museum, N.Y.), c540 B.C., has the same inscription.

Tmolus (tmō'lus). In Greek mythology, a son of Ares. He was a king in Lydia, the husband of Omphale, and, according to some accounts, the father of Tantalus. While out hunting on a mountain Tmolus saw and fell in love with one of the chaste companions of Artemis. He pursued her to the temple of Artemis where she sought refuge before the altar. There Tmolus found her and violated the sanctity of the temple by ravishing her. The maiden hanged herself, but before she died she called on Artemis to avenge her. Artemis sent a wild bull that attacked Tmolus, tossed him in the air with his horns, and caused him to fall on sharp stakes and stones. Tmolus perished as the result of his injuries. His son Theoclymenus buried him on the mountain where he died and named it Tmolus after him. As the deity of the forest-covered mountain, Tmolus wore a wreath of oak leaves on his head. He acted as judge in the musical contest between Pan and Apollo and proclaimed Apollo the victor.

Todi (tō'dē). See Tuder.

Tolumnius (tō-lōm'ni-us). In Roman legend, a Latin chief and soothsayer, allied to Turnus in the war against Aeneas. As an augur he was called on to interpret a sign: a swan was seized by an eagle, which was then attacked by other swans and compelled to let the first swan go. Tolumnius said this meant that the Latins should not allow Turnus to engage in single combat with Aeneas, but should help him. A truce had been proclaimed to let Aeneas and Turnus fight it out. Tolumnius, as a result of the omen, threw his spear and broke the truce. In the general battle that followed he was slain.

Tomi (tō'mī). [Also: Tomis.] In ancient geography, a town on the coast of the Euxine (Black) Sea, near what is now Constanta (Constanza), Rumania. It was the place to which the outspoken Roman poet Ovid was banished.

the Aral and Caspian Seas. Cyrus the Great, wishing to become lord of the tribe, sent an embassy to Tomyris inviting her to become his wife. Tomyris recognized, according to Herodotus, that his true purpose was to gain control of her kingdom and rejected his suit. Cyrus then prepared to conquer her kingdom by force, as guile had failed. He built boats to ferry his army across the river into her country. Tomyris sent an ambassador to him, and advised him to cease from making war, for he could not be sure that he would profit by the outcome. She counseled Cyrus to be content to rule over his own and allow her to rule her own. However, if Cyrus was unwilling to take her advice, she proposed that she would withdraw her forces three days' march within her frontier, or, if Cyrus preferred, he could withdraw his forces three days' march into his country; the withdrawing army would then wait until the other army caught up with it, whereupon they would engage in battle. Cyrus took council with the chief Persians. They advised him to let Tomyris invade his country. But Croesus, Lydian king who had been captured by Cyrus, objected; he said that if Cyrus let the Massagetae in and they defeated the Persians, the Massagetae would not withdraw and Cyrus would lose his country. On the other hand, if Cyrus defeated them, he would gain nothing but his own country. Moreover, it would be shameful to withdraw before a woman. Cyrus took his advice and sent word to Tomyris to withdraw, which she did. Cyrus now advanced against Tomyris. After three days' march he left one-third of his army, as Croesus had advised him to. This portion was the weakest third and he instructed them to make camp, to serve up a rich banquet, to drink wine and make merry. Meanwhile Cyrus withdrew with the rest of his army. The Massagetae attacked the forces in camp with one-third of their forces, and although the Persians resisted, they were overcome by the Massagetae. Then, as Croesus had foretold, the Massagetae fell on the feast which the Persians had been enjoying, and being unused to wine, drank of it until they were sated and fell into a stupor. Cyrus now returned and slew many of them and took Spargapises, son of Tomyris, captive. Tomyris sent Cyrus a message, chiding him for overcoming the Massagetae with wine and not with arms. She warned him to restore her son and retire, or she would glut him with blood. Spargapises, restored to sobriety and finding himself a captive, begged to be freed from his bonds. Cyrus released him, and instantly he took his own life. Tomyris, learning his fate, regrouped her forces and attacked. In fierce, desperate hand-to-hand fighting, the Massagetae prevailed, hacked the Persian army to pieces and killed Cyrus himself. Tomyris filled a skin with human blood, found the corpse of Cyrus, decapitated it, and flung the head into the skinful of blood. She maltreated the body and apostrophized it, saying that even though she had conquered Cyrus in battle, he had conquered her through the death of her son, but, as she had sworn, she had glutted him with blood. This, according to Herodotus, is how Cyrus met his death at the hands of a woman.

Toronaicus, Sinus (tôr-ô-nā'i-kus sī'nus). [Also: Gulf of Cassandra (Kassandra), Toronaic Gulf.] Arm of the Aegean Sea, between the peninsulas of Cassandra and Sithonia.

Torrhebus (tô-rē'bus). According to legend, a son of Atys who was a king of Lydia. He is sometimes confused with Tyrrhenus, the founder of the Tyrrhenian or Etruscan people. In some accounts he is reputed to be the son of Zeus and Torrhebia. His chief claim to fame was that, inspired by the nymphs, he invented the Lydian mode in music.

Torso Belvedere (tôr'sō bel-ve-dir'). Ancient figure of Heracles signed by the Athenian sculptor Apollonius, now in the Vatican, Rome. It is ascribed to the middle of the 1st century B.C., and is remarkable for the anatomical knowledge evidenced by the sitting position of the figure.

The structure was surmounted by a bronze Triton which served as a weathervane.

Trajan (trā'jan). [Full Latin name, Marcus Ulpius Trajanus; surnamed Dacicus and Parthicus.] Roman emperor (98–117 A.D.); born in Italica, Spain, 53 A.D.; died at Selinus, Cilicia, July or August, 117. He entered the army at an early age, served as military tribune in various provinces, marched from Spain to Germany (c88), was made consul (91) and by Nerva consular legate in Germany, and was adopted by Nerva, and succeeded him on the latter's death in January, 98. He developed the defenses of the empire on the northeastern frontier, built many roads and other improvements, founded the institution of alimenta (for rearing poor children in Italy), and encouraged various reforms. He conducted (c101–106) a successful war against the Dacians under Decebalus, and annexed Dacia to the empire; the Column of Trajan at Rome commemorates this conquest. He incorporated (114) Damascus, and part of Arabia, into the empire, and carried on an indecisive war with the Parthians (114–116). There were revolts in the eastern part of the empire and among the Jews in the last part of his reign, but he died before he could organize a campaign to put down the rebels.

Trajanopolis (trā'ja-nop'ō-lis). In ancient geography, a city in Thrace founded by Trajan. Trajan's Wall. According to tradition, it was founded by colonists from Argos and Thrace. A school of sculpture, known as the Trallian school, grew up there, and is best represented by the Farnese Bull, now in the National Museum at Naples.

Trapezus (trā-pē'zus). In ancient geography, a place in W Arcadia. Some say it was founded and named for Trapezus, a son of Lycaon. But some say its name means "table," and that here Zeus, disguised as a traveler, appeared to Lycaon. Lycaon did not believe him when Zeus said he was a god, and to test him served him a dish consisting of the flesh of his own son Nyctimus. Zeus thrust the table aside and changed Lycaon and his other sons into wolves, but restored Nyctimus to life. The people of Trapezus refused to abandon their city to join the new Arcadian city of Megalopolis (after 371 B.C.), but when the Arcadians would have compelled them, they left the Peloponnesus entirely and went to the Pontus, and were there welcomed by the city of Trapezus on the Euxine Sea (Pontus) that had the same name as their own Arcadian city.

Trapezus. [Also: Trebizond; modern name, Trabzon.] A seaport on the Pontus. It is picturesquely situated on a tableland between two deep ravines. Next to Smyrna (now Izmir) it was long the chief commercial city in Asia Minor, and a center of transit trade between Europe and Armenia, Persia, and C Asia. It was a dependency of the Greek colony of Sinope, a resting place on the retreat of the Ten Thousand Greeks, and an important city about the time of Hadrian. (JJ) they still remained after the defeat of Ariovistus (58 B.C.). They were probably merged ultimately in the Alamanni.

Tribune (trib'ūn). In Roman history, originally, a magistrate presiding over a tribe, or representing a tribe for certain purposes; specifically, a tribune of the people (tribunus plebis), an officer or magistrate chosen by the people, from the time of the secession (probably in 494 B.C.), to protect them from the oppression of the patricians or nobles, and to defend their liberties against any attempts upon them by the Senate and consuls. Their persons were inviolable, and any one who transgressed in regard to the respect due them was outlawed. These magistrates were at first two, but their number was increased to five and ultimately to ten, which last number appears to have remained unaltered down to the end of the empire. The tribunes figured especially in the assembly of the tribes (comitia tributa); they could inflict no direct punishment, but could propose the imposition of fines, and from their personal inviolability could afford protection to any person. With the advance of time, they could bring an offending patrician before the comitia, could sit in the Senate, could stop summarily proceedings instituted before any magistrate, could propose measures of state to the comitia or the Senate, and finally could even issue peremptory edicts and suspend decrees of the Senate. Their powers were greatly curtailed by the emperors. The name tribune was also given to any one of general officers of the legions (tribunus militaris), and to certain other officers, as the tribunus voluptatum, or superintendent of public amusements, of Diocletian and later.

Tricca (trik'ā). [Modern name, Trikkala.] In ancient geography, a town of Thessaly, situated N of the Peneus River. It is mentioned by Homer as the home of Machaon and Podalirius, sons of Asclepius who accompanied the Greeks to Troy as physicians, for like their father they possessed the art of healing. Homer names Tricca as the "pasture of horses," and in antiquity it was especially celebrated for the magnificent horses raised there. There was in Tricca a temple of Asclepius to which pilgrims repaired for healing.

Tricrena (trī-krē'na). In ancient geography, mountains near Pheneüs, in Arcadia, where there are three springs (thus accounting for the name). Hermes was thought to have been bathed in these after he was born, and for this reason they were sacred to him.

Tridentum (trī-den'tum). [Modern name, Trent.] In ancient geography, a city in NE Italy, situated on the Athesis (Adige) River. It was a Celtic colony, was fortified by the Roman emperor Augustus, and served as a base for the campaign of Drusus (15 B.C.) which incorporated the Alpine countries into the Roman domain.

Trifanum (tri-fā'num), Battle of. Decisive victory in the Latin War, gained by the Romans at Trifanum (between Minturnae and Suessa Aurunca, in Italy), over the Latins and Campanians, c338 B.C.

Trimalchio (tri-mal'ki-ō). A rich freedman, the central figure in the Cena Trimalchionis, a long episode in the Satyricon, the novel ascribed to Petronius Arbiter (d. 66 A.D.). Trimalchio, vulgar and ostentatious but good-natured, embodies the newly-risen class of very rich freedmen that achieved economic and even political power during the first half of the 1st century A.D., especially under the emperor Claudius, and is satirized by Petronius. Trimalchio (a fictional character, of course) is a former slave of oriental origin who as a boy served the lusts of both his master and his mistress, was freed and has achieved fabulous wealth. The exquisite bad taste he displays at his feast, together with his ludicrous pretensions to culture, is satirized most wittily; the solecisms committed by him and his fellow-freedmen contrast amusingly with the choice language of his educated guests. The slangy, earthy speech of the lower classes, interspersed with Greek turns of phrase, with proverbs and riddles, is also of great interest to the student of Latin and Romance linguistics. (HS)

Trinacria (tri-nā'kri-a). Old name of Sicily, meaning "Three Points," referring to the three promontories Pachynus, Peloris, and Lilybaeum.

Trinovantes (trī-nō-van'tēz). [Also: Trinobantes (-ban'-).] Ancient non-Belgic people of SE Britain, formerly living in what is now Essex. They sided with Julius Caesar against the Belgic settlers already in Britain. Their chief town was on the site of modern Colchester.

Trinummus (trī-num'us). Comedy by Plautus.

Triopium (trī-ō'pi-um). A temple of the five Doric cities of Asia Minor (Lindus, Ialysus, Camirus, Cos, and Cnidus), located on a promontory in Cnidus, which was itself at the end of a long peninsula. At one time there were six Doric cities that worshiped at this temple, but once at the Triopian games for Apollo the winner, a man of Halicarnassus, in defiance of the law took the tripods he had won home to his own house instead of dedicating them to Apollo in the temple. Thenceforth the people of Halicarnassus were forbidden to enter the temple.

Triphylia (trī-fil'i-a). In ancient geography, a region in the S part of Elis, disputed for centuries by Elis and Arcadia. There was a celebrated temple of Samian Poseidon at Triphylia, and it was the seat of a league of six Minyan cities. In the time of Herodotus most of its cities were in ruins. The warrior and historian Xenophon, exiled from Athens, lived for a time at Scillus in Triphylia, and there set down the Anabasis, the celebrated history of the march of the Ten Thousand.

Tripod (trī'pod). In pre-classical and classical antiquity, a seat, table, or other article resting on three feet. Specifically 1) A three-legged seat or table. 2) A pot or caldron used for heating water or boiling meat, and either raised upon a three-legged frame or stand, or made with three feet in the same piece with itself. 3) A bronze altar, originally identical in form with the caldron described above. It had three rings at the top to serve ground in the innermost sanctuary, that the Pythian priestesses at Delphi gave their oracular responses. The celebrity of this tripod, which was especially sacred to the Pythian Apollo and was a usual attribute of him, led to innumerable imitations of it, which were made to be used in sacrifice, and ornamented tripods of similar form, sometimes made of the precious metals, were given as prizes at The Pythian Games and elsewhere, and were frequently placed as votive gifts in temples, especially in those of Apollo.

Triptolemus (trip-tol'ē-mus). In Greek mythology, a favorite of Demeter. His symbol was an ear of wheat. He was everywhere honored as the one who taught the arts of agriculture to mankind. The Eleusinians said he was a son of Celeus and Metanira of Eleusis, or a brother or fellow townsman of Celeus. The Argives said he was a son of Trochilus, a priest of the mysteries in Argos, who fled to Attica and married a woman of Eleusis who bore him Triptolemus and another son Eubuleus. The Athenians claimed he was the son of Celeus but others said Oceanus was his father and Gaea his mother, or that Dysaules was his father, or even Poseidon. The truth is that many were anxious to claim him because of his great gifts to mankind. Some say he was the only one to recognize the goddess Demeter when she sought shelter in the house of Celeus during her search for Persephone. Triptolemus was able to tell her that the earth had parted and a chariot drawn by black horses and bearing Persephone had disappeared into the chasm. He became a favorite of Demeter and she taught him her sacred rites and mysteries. She also gave him seed wheat, instructed him in the use of the plow, and sent him a chariot drawn by winged serpents in which to travel throughout the world instructing mankind in the arts of agriculture. He went through Europe and Asia spreading the knowledge of agriculture and, some say, he came at last to the land of Scythia. There he revealed his name and his mission to the king, Lyncus. Lyncus pretended to welcome him but, out of jealousy, resolved to kill him. As Triptolemus slept he attacked him with a sword. His effort was in vain; before he could harm Triptolemus, Demeter transformed Lyncus into a lynx. Triptolemus continued his journeying. According to some accounts, he was the founder of Eleusis and established the worship of Demeter there, as well as the festival called the Thesmophoria.

He was honored in Eleusis with a temple dedicated to him, and was honored throughout as the patron of agriculture. Some say that when Demeter came to the house of Celeus in Eleusis, she acted as nurse for his son Demophoön, and would have made him immortal had she not been interrupted by the child's mother. In her anger at the interruption she dropped the child in the fire in which she had been burning away his mortal parts, and he perished. The goddess promised to bring great honor to his brother Triptolemus to atone for his loss.

Tritantæchmes (trī'tan-tēk'mēz). A son of Artabanus and nephew of Darius the Great of Persia. He was a Persian captain under Xerxes in the invasion of Greece, 480 B.C. According to Herodotus, when he heard that the prize for which men contested at the Olympic Games was not money but a crown of olive leaves he said, "Alas, Mardonius, what manner of men hast thou brought us to fight against, who contend not for money, but for honor."

Tritogeneia (trī'tō-jē-nī'a). Epithet of Athena. Some say it means "Trito-born" and derives from the fact that the goddess was born from the head of Zeus near the lake Tritonis in Libya. Depending on the meaning assigned to the first element, the name may mean "head-born," "born on the third day," "the third child," or "thrice-born."

Triton (trī'ton). In Greek mythology, a gigantic son of Poseidon and the Nereid Amphitrite. He was the brother of Rhode and Benthescyme and dwelt at the bottom of the sea; he was also thought to frequent the Lake Tritonis in Libya. When the Argonauts voyaging home from Colchis were driven into the desert of Libya by a great storm, Jason propitiated the deities of the land by offering two bronze tripods that had been given to him by the priestess of Delphi before he set out for Colchis. Triton appeared and seized the tripods. In response to requests of the Argonauts he towed the Argo back to the sea. He gave Euphemus a clod of Libyan earth that made Euphemus and his descendants masters of Libya. In the later mythology Tritons appear as a class of minor sea-deities, figuring with Nereids in the train of the greater sea-gods. They were conceived as having human figures from the waist up combined with those of fish from the waist down. A common attribute of the Tritons is a shell-trumpet, which they blow to raise or calm storms.

Triton. A river in Boeotia. According to some accounts, Athena lived in the nearby city of Athenae when she first came to Greece from Libya, via Crete. Also, the Nile River was sometimes called Triton.

Triton. [Modern name, Garavos.] In ancient geography, a river of Crete, rising E of Mount Ida and flowing N into the sea. Some say that it was while walking on the banks of this river that Zeus was smitten with a violent headache, following which Athena sprang fully-armed from his brow.

Tritonis (trī-tō'nis), or Triton, Lake. A vast lake that once covered a large part of the lowlands of Libya. Athena was sometimes said to have been born on the edge of this lake, hence her epithet "Tritogeneia." The Argonauts, swept onto the desert by a great wave, came at last to this lake and were shown a route to the sea by Triton. The lake was thought to have been formed by a tidal wave that engulfed the shores of Libya, and to have disappeared ultimately as a consequence of earthquakes. In classical times the lake covered 900 square miles, having shrunk considerably since mythological times. It has now shrunk to a salt lake about 120 miles long in SW central Tunisia, known as Shatt el Jerid, if indeed this body of water is to be identified with Lake Tritonis. Possibly the lake also once included the Shatt el Melghir, another salt lake about 100 miles long in NE Algeria.

Tritonis. In ancient geography, a stream near Aliphera in Arcadia, where, according to the Arcadians, Athena was born from the head of Zeus.

Triumvirate, First. In Roman history, an agreement or alliance formed in 60 B.C. by Julius Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus, for the purpose of dividing the power among them. Caesar obtained the consulship for the next year (59 B.C.) and a command in Cisalpine Gaul (extended to Transalpine Gaul) and Illyricum for five years (extended for five years more). Pompey received for his veterans assignment of lands, and for himself later the administration of the grain supply. By a renewal of the Triumvirate at Luca in

56 B.C., Pompey received the consulship and command in Spain, and Crassus the consulship and command in the East (where he was killed in 53 B.C.). The union between Caesar and Pompey was formally broken by the civil war in 49 B.C.

Triumvirate, Second. In Roman history, an alliance formed in 43 B.C. by Octavian (the future Augustus), Mark Antony, and Lepidus. The triumvirs were to have consular powers for three years; they appointed magistrates, and their decrees were valid as laws. Octavian received Africa and the islands; Mark Antony, Gaul; Lepidus, Spain and Narbonensis. The alliance was followed by a wholesale proscription, and by the overthrow of the republicans under Brutus and Cassius in 42 B.C. Lepidus was soon reduced to a minor position, and was eventually banished. By a treaty at Brundisium, Octavian received the West and Mark Antony the East. The union was broken in 31 B.C., and Mark Antony was overthrown in the battle of Actium.

Trivia (triv'i-ə). In Roman mythology, an epithet, corresponding to the Greek Trioditis, of Hecate, meaning "the Goddess of Crossroads." The epithet also applied to Diana when she was identified with Hecate.

Troad (trō'ad). In ancient geography, the region in NW Asia Minor about the city of Troy, which was its capital. It included a number of allied and dependent cities, and extended to the Hellespont and the Aegean Sea. In the Trojan War the Greeks harried the cities of the Troad for nine years before they attacked the capital city itself.

Trochilus (trok'i-lus). According to some accounts, a priest of the mysteries at Argos. He fled from Argos and went to Eleusis. There he married and became the father of Triptolemus and Eubuleus.

Troezen (trē'zen). In ancient geography, a city in the Peloponnesus, Greece, situated near the coast, about 39 miles SW of Athens. It was originally an Ionian settlement, but later became Doric. According to Pausanias, the Troezenians were "unrivalled glorifiers of their own country." They claimed that one Orus, a son of the soil, was the first king of their land, and that in his time it was called Oraea after him. His daughter had a son by Poseidon, whose name was Althepus, and he renamed the land Althepia. During the reign of Althepus, the Troezenians said, Athena and Poseidon struggled for control of their country. Their contest was decided by Zeus, who ruled that Athena and Poseidon should share control of the territory. Thus the Troezenians worshiped, above all Athena Polias (Of the City) and Athena Sthenias (Strong), and Poseidon, whom they called King. The temple of Athena Sthenias was on the citadel. The dual worship was memorialized in ancient coins which had a trident on one side and a head of Athena on the other. Following Althepus, Saron, for whom the Saronic Gulf was named, was king. There was then a long break in the line of kings whose names were known by the Troezenians, until they came to Hyperes and Anthas, sons of Poseidon. These founded the cities of Hyperea and Anthea. Troezen and Pittheus, sons of Pelops, came into the land and allied themselves with the king, so that there were now three rulers. The three rulers were commemorated in the tomb of Pittheus, which had three white seats surrounding it where the three kings used to sit in judgment. When Troezen died, Pittheus united the cities of Hyperea and Anthea into one city, which he named Troezen after his dead brother, and by this name it continued to be known. Pittheus was noted for his wisdom, and was said to have taught the art of rhetoric in an ancient temple of the Muses raised by Ardalus, a son of Hephaestus. Pittheus had a daughter, Aethra, who became the mother of Theseus, either by Poseidon or by King Aegeus of Athens. Thus did Troezen, through the exploits of Theseus, become closely allied to Athens in the future history of the two states. The area about Troezen was dotted with sites connected with the youth of Theseus. He dedicated the temple of Artemis Savior in the agora in thanks for his safe return from Crete. Hippolytus, son of Theseus and the Amazon Antiope, was sent to live in Troezen when Theseus married Phaedra, so that he would not appear as a rival in Athens to his younger half-brothers. He raised the temple of Artemis Lycea (Wolfish) there, either because he drove the wolves out of Troezen, or because Lycea was a name of Artemis among the Amazons, his mother's people. In Troezen Phaedra fell in love with her stepson, with tragic consequences. She used to watch him practice in the exercise ground, and as she did so, she pierced the leaves of the nearby myrtle tree with the pin of her brooch as a relief to her frustration, for Hippolytus not only did not return her love; he was totally unaware of it and was horrified when he learned of it. On the spot where Phaedra spied on him, the temple of Aphrodite Catascopeo (Spy) was raised, and the leaves of the myrtle trees of Troezen ever afterward bore a strange marking, as if they had been pierced. The tombs of Phaedra and Hippolytus were, in ancient times, pointed out to travelers in Troezen. They had been buried near each other.

The Troezenians claimed that Dionysus brought up his mother from Hades, and that Heracles dragged Cerberus to the light, in their territory. They also said they were visited by Orestes, and showed what was called "the Booth of Orestes." Since none could receive him until he had been purified of his mother's blood, Orestes lived in this booth. He was at last cleansed by water from the Hippocrene Spring at Troezen, for the Troezenians said that Bellerophon came to their city seeking the hand of Pitheus' daughter Aethra in marriage. His horse Pegasus caused the spring to gush forth by stamping his hoof on the ground, just as he had done in Boeotia. Before a marriage with Aethra could be arranged, Bellerophon was banished from Corinth. The descendants of those who purified Orestes commemorated the event by dining at this booth on certain days. The stone on which nine Troezenians purified him was still shown centuries later. Near an image of Hermes in the city was an ancient olive tree. It was said that Heracles, passing this way, leaned his club against the image. From his olive wood club sprang a shoot that grew into the tree. The sanctuary of Pan Lyterius (Releasing) was dedicated in gratitude to that god for sending a dream to the Troezenian magistrates in which was revealed the cure for an epidemic that was ravaging the populace. Among other sanctuaries were those of Zeus, Aphrodite of the Height, and Apollo.

When he returned he raised a temple of Seafaring Apollo because he survived the great storms that battered the Greeks on their voyage home from Troy. It was Diomedes, they say, who dedicated the famous ancient precinct of Hippolytus, raised a temple to him, and was the first to sacrifice to him as a hero. Priests of Hippolytus held their office for life. Among the honors accorded to him as a hero, maidens dedicated a lock of their hair in his temple before marriage. The Troezenians held strong views about their hero; they did not admit that he was dragged to his death by his horses. They said he was translated to the heavens as the constellation Charioteer.

Troezen early sent out colonists. In Caria they founded the cities of Halicarnassus and Myndus. In the Persian War the Troezenians received the women and children who were sent to them for safety as the Persians approached Athens (480 B.C.). Stone images set up in the agora afterward represented these fugitives and commemorated Troezenian hospitality. The Troezenians played a valiant part in the war. They sent five ships to join the Greek fleet, a thousand men to Plataea, and at the battle of Mycale (479 B.C.), Herodotus says that, after the Athenians, "the most valiant were the men of Corinth, of Troezen, and of Sicyon." In the middle of the 5th century B.C. Troezen came under the dominion of Athens. It was an unwilling partnership, and later the Troezenians took the side of Sparta in the disastrous Peloponnesian Wars.

Trogus (trō'gus), Cnaeus Pompeius. Roman historian; fl. c10 A.D. He was the author of a general history, Historiae Philippicae, in 44 books, partly preserved in an epitome by Justinus. Written in an elaborate narrative style, the work may have been based on Timagenes of Alexandria.

Troia (trō'ya). A Latin name of ancient Troy. Troilus (trō'i-lus, troi'lus). In Greek legend, a younger son of Hecuba. He was acknowledged as a son of Priam but some say Apollo was his father. According to a prophecy, Troy would not fall to the Greeks in the Trojan War if Troilus reached the age of twenty. Some say Achilles saw Troilus and pursued him to the sanctuary of the temple of Thymbraean Apollo and killed him there, where, according to some accounts, Achilles himself was fated to die. Others say Achilles came upon him while he was exercising his horses near the sea and killed him, or that Troilus dared meet Achilles in face-to-face combat and, having fallen wounded, was dragged to his death by his own horses. any case, it was certainly Achilles who killed or caused the death of Troilus. The story of Troilus' tragic love for Cressida (or Criseyde or Criseida) comes not from ancient sources but from a poem by a 12th century troubadour. It relates that Troilus was in love with Cressida, a daughter of Calchas, who remained in Troy and was loyal to the Trojans. On the demand of Agamemnon she was restored to her father by Priam, and went to the Greek camp. She betrayed the undying love which she had sworn for Troilus by falling in love and yielding to the caresses of Diomedes.

Trojan Horse (trō'jan). In Greek legend, the huge wooden horse which the Greeks constructed and left on the beach before Troy in the last days of the Trojan War. The Trojans, believing it to be a sacrifice to Athena, hauled it into the city. But inside the horse were armed warriors. They descended from it in the night, opened the city gates to their comrades, and brought about the fall of Troy. Thus the Greeks, who could not overcome the Trojans by direct assault, penetrated their city by stratagem and brought about its ruin from within. The phrase has come to mean a stratagem or method that appears innocent, or that is carried out in secret, which is used by a foe to penetrate his opponent's camp, literally or figuratively, and weaken it from within. See also, Wooden Horse.

Trojan War (trō'jan). A war between the Greeks and the Trojans, celebrated by ancient writers, notably by Homer in the Iliad, which is now thought to have taken place about 1200 B.C. The actual causes of the war have been obscured under layers of myth and legend in which brilliantly imaginative writers recorded the actual event. Trade routes sought by the vigorous and expanding Greek cities may have occasioned the struggle. An unfriendly or uncoöperative power in Troy, which commanded the entrance to the Hellespont, had to be subdued or, as it happened, to be utterly destroyed, to permit the expansion of the peoples of Hellas into the area about the Euxine (Black) Sea. Some of the figures named in the epics had historical prototypes; as Agamemnon and Nestor. Others were added as the creative invention of ancient writers demanded.

As developed in myth and legend, the cause of the Trojan War goes back to the marriage of Peleus and Thetis and was the result of a deliberate plan on the part of Zeus and Themis, for reasons never satisfactorily explained. All the gods and goddesses except Eris were invited to the wedding of Peleus and Thetis. Eris, goddess of discord, took her revenge for being left out by hurling a golden apple inscribed "To the Fairest" at the feet of the goddesses Athena, Hera, and Aphrodite as they stood talking together among the guests. Each of the three goddesses claimed that the apple was intended for her. They appealed to Zeus to settle the dispute, but he wisely refused to make a choice and referred them to a young shepherd on Mount Ida in the Troad who was reputed to be a great and fair judge of beauty. The young shepherd was Paris, son of Priam, king of Troy, and to him the goddesses repaired. Athena offered him wisdom and victory in all his wars if he awarded the apple to her. Hera promised to make him rich and the lord of all Asia. Aphrodite offered him the most beautiful woman in the world for a bride. Paris awarded (the "Judgment of Paris") the apple to Aphrodite. From that time the Trojans, as the race of Paris, suffered the implacable hatred of Hera and Athena. Most of the Olympian deities freely took sides, playing active and decisive roles in the war that resulted from this judgment of Paris.

The fairest woman in the world was Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta. Paris, although married to the nymph Oenone, went to his father's palace in Troy, and was recognized as that son of Priam and Hecuba who had been left on the mountain to die in his infancy because of prophecies that he would cause the destruction of Troy. He had been saved and brought up by a shepherd. Delighted with his beauty and courage, Priam and Hecuba welcomed their new-found son despite the urgent warnings of Cassandra, Helenus, and other seers that he would bring ruin to Troy. Secretly thinking of Helen, the bride promised him by Aphrodite, Paris offered to go on a mission to Greece to discuss the return of Hesione, sister of King Priam, who had been carried off by Telamon some years before and whom the Greeks had refused to return. If he was unsuccessful in this mission, he volunteered that he might bring back some Greek princess as a hostage. Priam, again disregarding the warnings of his prophetic daughter Cassandra, provided a fleet and Paris set out. Menelaus received him kindly in Sparta and entertained him royally for nine days. At the end of that time, ignoring a fact obvious to all—that Paris was madly in love with Helen—Menelaus blandly sailed off to Crete to his grandfather's funeral, leaving his kingdom and the entertainment of his guest in Helen's charge. Helen eloped with Paris that same night, taking with her her young son and a great treasure, but leaving her only daughter Hermione behind in Sparta. Hera sent great storms that drove Paris' fleet off its course. Furthermore, to avoid pursuit by Menelaus, Paris sailed to Cyprus, Sidon, Phoenicia, and Egypt, so that it was some time before he returned to Troy with Helen.

In the meantime Menelaus had learned of the abduction of Helen. He immediately went to Agamemnon in Mycenae and demanded that an expedition be assembled to sail against Troy and recover her. Agamemnon agreed to do this if peaceful means failed. He sent envoys to Troy to demand the restoration of Helen, but the Trojans refused. According to some accounts, they knew nothing of the matter because Paris had not yet landed in Troy with Helen. But once he did bring her to Troy, all Troy fell in love with her and Priam vowed he would never let her go. As a result, each of several embassies that demanded her return was rejected, and those Trojan advisers who on divers occasions throughout the war counseled that she be restored to her husband were scorned. As peaceful means of regaining Helen failed, Agamemnon called on the Greek princes to fulfill their oath. This oath had been taken under the following circumstances. Helen was so beautiful and had so many suitors that Tyndareus, her supposed father, feared to give her hand to any one of them lest the disappointed suitors turn against him. Odysseus suggested to Tyndareus that he require all the suitors to swear on the joints of a dismembered horse that they would go to the aid of whichever suitor won Helen's hand, in the event that any ill should come to him as a result of his marriage to Helen. Tyndareus adopted this course and all the suitors took the oath. The mightiest and richest princes of Greece had been suitors of Helen; all were now commanded to fulfill their oath and come to the aid of Menelaus. Moreover, Agamemnon added, if the Trojans were not punished for the theft of Helen, no Greek husband could be sure of his wife's safety. Odysseus, although not one of the suitors, was needed for his wisdom and skill. Reluctantly he came from Ithaca. Achilles, accompanied by his intimate friend Patroclus and leading his Myrmidons, came from Scyros. Diomedes, fresh from his victory at Thebes, came with his friends Sthenelus and Euryalus. Idomeneus, king of Crete, brought his squire Meriones and 80 ships. Aged Nestor, noted for his wisdom, arrived from Pylus with his sons

Thrasymedes and Antilochus. Telamonian Ajax and his half-brother Teucer commanded a fleet from Salamis. Oilean, or Lesser Ajax, and his half-brother Medon commanded the men of Locris. King Cinyras of Cyprus promised to send 50 ships but defaulted. Tlepolemus, son of Heracles, brought nine ships from Rhodes. Many other heroes and demigods joined Agamemnon's expedition. The Greek fleet, over 1000 ships strong, assembled at Aulis. There, while Agamemnon was sacrificing, a blue serpent with crimson markings on its back darted out, coiled its way up a plane tree and devoured eight nestlings and a mother sparrow in their nest. The serpent was then turned to stone. Calchas, the seer who advised Agamemnon throughout the war, said this was an omen that nine years would be swallowed up and that in the tenth year Troy would fall. Others made the same prophecy about the duration of the war. But some say the war lasted twenty years. Homer has Helen say it is now the twentieth year since she left Sparta.

The Greeks sailed from Aulis and raided the coasts of Asia Minor. Some say they did not know the course to Troy, and that they landed in Mysia and ravaged it under the impression that they were in the Troad. For some time they cruised along the coast, attacking and sacking cities. At length the fleet was scattered by violent storms and the ships returned to their homeland. After nine years, according to some accounts, the fleet again assembled at Aulis. This time unfavorable winds delayed their sailing. In accordance with a prophecy by Calchas, Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia and thus secured favorable winds. Telephus, a king of Mysia who had been wounded in the raids on his shores, had come to Greece to be cured of his wound. He marked out the course the Greeks should take to Troy, and the correctness of his course was confirmed by divination. The fleet sailed once more. They touched at Lesbos and then at the island of Tenedos, within sight of Troy. There Achilles attacked and killed Tenes, who tried to prevent the Greeks from landing on his shores. This Tenes was reputed to be a son of Apollo, and Thetis, among other warnings to her son Achilles, had told him if he killed a son of Apollo, he would die by Apollo's hand. The death of Tenes by Achilles was only one of many signs and portents that foretold to Achilles that he would not survive the Trojan War. On Tenedos also, according to some accounts, Philoctetes, possessor of the bow and arrows of Heracles, was bitten by a snake with such disastrous results that the Greeks were at length compelled to abandon him on Lemnos. According to some accounts, Agamemnon sent Menelaus, Odysseus, and Palamedes to Troy from Tenedos to make a final demand for the return of Helen. They were unsuccessful, and would have been killed by the indignant Trojans if Antenor had not prevented such an outrage against the laws of war and of hospitality. The Greeks now sailed past Sigeum, the headland of Troy, and beached their ships within sight of the city. Protesilaus was the first to leap ashore and, in accordance with a prophecy that the first ashore at Troy would die, was killed; some say, by Hector. The siege of Troy itself which now began, the disastrous quarrel between Agamemnon and Achilles, the death of Patroclus, and the death and burial of Hector, noblest of the Trojans, comprise the Iliad, q.v. The Trojans were not without allies. Heroes and demigods, such as Aeneas, Sarpedon, and Glaucus had joined them, and after the death of Hector, Penthesilea the Amazon, and Memnon the Ethiopian son of Eos, came to the aid of Troy. After inflicting great damage on the Greeks and so discouraging them that Agamemnon considered withdrawal, each was in turn killed by Achilles, who drove the Trojans back into the city each time. But Achilles had run his course. Apollo, some say, directed an arrow from Paris' bow that pierced Achilles' ankle or heel, his one vulnerable spot. Achilles pulled out the arrow and flung it away; it was wafted back to Apollo. Enraged with his wound and blaming Apollo, Achilles with his last strength hurled his spear and killed a Trojan; then he expired. Telamonian Ajax bore his body back to the Greek ships through a raging press of Trojans who were trying to gain possession of their fallen enemy's corpse. The death of Achilles brought about the death of Telamonian Ajax. At the command of Thetis, the armor of Achilles was to be awarded to the bravest of the Greeks. Odysseus was given the honor and the armor. Ajax, who had great ground for thinking he deserved it, was inspired with madness by Athena. In his frenzy he slaughtered innocent cattle under the impression that they were Greeks who had been unfriendly to him. When Athena decided to restore him to sanity, he was appalled at what he had done. In despair at the humiliation he had brought on himself he committed suicide.

The loss of Achilles and Ajax discouraged the Greeks and, as had happened before, they talked of giving up the struggle and sailing for home. Calchas reminded them of the omen of the serpent and the sparrows, and that this was now the tenth year when victory was prophesied. He informed them that Troy could not be taken without the bow and arrows of Heracles. Their possessor Philoctetes was accordingly fetched from Lemnos and was healed of his wound by Machaon the physician; then with the arrows of Heracles he shot Paris. After the death of Paris, Deiphobus and Helenus, his brothers, struggled for Helen's hand. She was awarded to Deiphobus, who forcibly married her, and Helenus left the city. He was captured by the Greeks and told them that Troy could not be taken without the presence of a bone of Pelops, nor without Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, nor could it be taken as long as the Palladium remained in the citadel. Agamemnon immediately sent for the bone of Pelops, and to Scyrus for Neoptolemus. Eurypylus, descendant of Heracles, now came to the aid of the Trojans. He fought valiantly and again drove the Greeks back to their ships. But the gods intervened, as they had done from the beginning, and caused Neoptolemus to slay Eurypylus. Odysseus and Diomedes disguised themselves and entered Troy. Some say Odysseus was recognized by Helen and brought before Hecuba, that he told them the Greeks' plans and was allowed to go free. Another account is that this mission of Odysseus was a different one from the raid made with Diomedes, and was in the nature of a scouting sortie. When Odysseus and Diomedes made their raid Diomedes scaled the wall of Troy from the shoulders of Odysseus, gained the Palladium, and returned with it to the Greek camp. In any event, it seems agreed that Odysseus at some time entered Troy secretly, was recognized by Helen and Hecuba, and was allowed to return to the Greek ships.

In all the years of the war there had been some in Troy who advised that Helen be restored to Menelaus, with all the treasure she had brought with her. This advice had always been scorned, and those who gave it were regarded almost as traitors. Now, after the disasters following the deaths of Hector, Penthesilea, Memnon, Eurypylus, and Paris, there were some in Troy who advised flight from the city, rather than be caught like rats in a trap. Others said the war should be carried on from the walls and towers of Troy rather than on the plain where the great battles had cost so many lives. But this advice, as militarily sound as the other was politically sound, was rejected.

The Greeks too had their hours of doubt and despair. It was now proposed to take the city by stratagem rather than by direct assault. The idea of the Wooden Horse was put forth, some say by Odysseus, who in any case took credit for the idea. This proposal was enthusiastically adopted, except by Neoptolemus and Philoctetes who protested that it was cowardly. Epeus, aided by Athena, built the Wooden Horse in three days. Odysseus now proposed that the Greeks leave it on the beach before Troy with the most valiant warriors concealed inside it. The fleet would sail away behind the island of Tenedos, the camp fires would be doused, and the Trojans would happily conclude that the Greeks had sailed for home. In addition, Odysseus proposed that some one be left behind with a tale to account for his presence, who would persuade the Trojans to draw the Wooden Horse with its deadly freight inside the walls of Troy. Sinon volunteered to carry out this part of the plan. When the Trojans saw that the Greeks had apparently departed, they swarmed out onto the beach to examine the great horse. As they wondered about it and heard Laocoön and Cassandra plead with them to destroy it or it would destroy Troy, Sinon, who had arranged to be captured, was dragged forward. He said he had just escaped being sacrificed by the Greeks, who had sailed for home in despair, and that the Wooden Horse was an offering to Athena, to propitiate the goddess for the theft of the Palladium. The offering had purposely been made huge so that it could not be taken inside the walls of Troy, for the city that possessed it would conquer Europe. On hearing this the Trojans, deaf to the warnings of Cassandra and Laocoön, resolved to take the enormous offering into the city. The fact that a serpent slithered from the sea and crushed Laocoön and his two sons in its coils, indicated to them that the gods had punished Laocoön for his doubts and confirmed them in their resolve to take the offering into the city. They breached the walls to make way for the horse and rolled it inside the walls, decorated it with flowers and performed ritual dances about it. Then the Trojans went wearily to bed. In the night Sinon gave the signal to the men in the Wooden Horse, lighted a beacon to advise the Greek fleet to return from Tenedos, and opened the gates of Troy. The Greeks streamed in and sacked the city. Priam was slain by Neoptolemus before the altar of Zeus in his courtyard. Deiphobus, Helen's new husband, was killed and horribly mangled. The Greeks protected the family of Antenor by hanging a leopard's skin over the door of his house, because he had protected early envoys from the Greeks and had consistently advised the restoration of Helen. Aeneas escaped with his father and son from the burning city, carrying the gods of Troy with him. Astyanax, young son of Hector, was hurled to his death from the towers of Troy. Polyxena, daughter of Priam, was sacrificed on Achilles' tomb. In the division of the captives, Odysseus took Hecuba, Agamemnon claimed Cassandra, and Neoptolemus took Andromache. When the Greeks departed with their captives, Troy was in flames. The city, which had been an important bastion guarding the Hellespont and thus the entry into the Euxine Sea, never regained its important role. In fact, for centuries, even the site was lost. See Troy.

Trojan Women, The. A tragedy by Euripides, written about 415 B.C. It is concerned with a day after the end of the Trojan War, and powerfully depicts the utter emptiness of

Poseidon laments the destruction of Troy, a city for which he had affection because he, with Apollo, had built its walls. He recalls the infamous Wooden Horse and the disaster it brought Troy, and the death of Priam. He speaks of Hecuba weeping before the gates, unaware that her youngest daughter, Polyxena, lies dead on Achilles' grave, and that another daughter, Cassandra, is to be Agamemnon's concubine. He blames Hera and Athena, who combined to give the Greeks victory and to destroy the Trojan city and race. Athena enters and asks Poseidon's aid to punish the Greeks (whom she had helped for ten years) because Ajax had dragged Cassandra from Athena's shrine and the other Greeks had not rebuked him. Poseidon agrees, and promises to send great storms to harry and delay the Greeks when they sail for home. The immortals depart.

Hecuba enters. She weeps for Priam's 50 sons, perished in the war, and expresses her fear of being carried off as a captive by the Greeks. Talthybius, Agamemnon's herald, comes to tell her the Greeks have chosen their captives: Cassandra will go to Agamemnon, Andromache to Achilles' son, and Hecuba herself to Odysseus. He evades her questions about Polyxena by saying that her fate has been settled. Cassandra enters, apparently maddened by her suffering. Actually she is in a prophetic trance. Of Agamemnon she says that he has lost what most he loved—his wife and children—to his brother. Of the Greeks, she says they fought and fell on foreign soil, away from their loved ones, for nothing, whereas the Trojans died gloriously in defense of their own land. She predicts Hecuba's death in Troy, ten years of peril and wandering for Odysseus, and her own death and the destruction of Agamemnon, and departs with Talthybius. Andromache now enters with her son Astyanax. She tells Hecuba of the death of Polyxena as a sacrifice to Achilles, and wishes that she too had died. Talthybius, returning, with compassion informs Andromache that on the advice of Odysseus not to rear a hero's son, Astyanax must die. He urges Andromache to give up her child without a struggle so that the Greeks will not deny him proper burial. Crying out against Helen, the cause of all her suffering, Andromache kisses Astyanax and hands him over to be dashed to death from the towers of Troy. After Andromache's departure Menelaus enters. He says he fought to avenge himself on Paris, not to recapture Helen. Hecuba begs him to kill Helen, who was the cause of death and suffering to so many, but asks him first to allow Helen to speak in her own defense so that she, Hecuba, can list her crimes in answering that defense. Helen speaks. She blames Hecuba for bearing Paris and for refusing to destroy him as she had been warned to do; she speaks of the Judgment of Paris and says that she was the helpless prize he chose when bribed by the goddesses; she accuses Menelaus of callously going off to Crete and leaving her alone when Paris came to Sparta to visit them; and lastly, for her own part in the tragedy, she says she was ruled by Aphrodite, the goddess of love who could overcome even Zeus himself. Hecuba scorns the defense of Helen and again urges Menelaus to kill her, but he is shaken, and says he will punish her when they return to Argos. He and Helen leave. Talthybius now comes to Hecuba, bearing the lifeless body of Astyanax on his shield. He gives it to her for burial. Mourning, Hecuba sorrowfully asks why the Greeks, who have utterly destroyed the Trojan warriors, should have feared this child. Talthybius orders the Greek captains to set Troy afire and commands Hecuba to go to Odysseus' ship. Hecuba, a broken, lamenting old woman, leaves the dead child and departs as Troy crashes in flames.

Tropaeon (trō-pē'an). Epithet of Zeus. The Dorians set up a sanctuary of Tropaeon Zeus (He Who Puts to Flight) in Sparta after they had conquered the Achaeans of Amyclae.

Trophonius (trō-fō'ni-us). In Greek mythology, a son of Erginus the Argonaut, of Orchomenus, or, according to some accounts, a son of Apollo. He was the brother of Agamedes. He and his brother, born in their father's old age, were famous builders. According to legend, they built the temple at Delphi on foundations laid by Apollo, the temple of Poseidon at Mantinea, the chamber of Alcmena in Thebes, and the treasuries of Augeas in Elis and of Hyrieus in Boeotia. To reward them for their labors on his temple Apollo told them to feast and be merry for six days, and on the seventh day they would receive the greatest gift in his power. They feasted and enjoyed themselves for six days. On the seventh they went to bed and died peacefully in their sleep. An easy death was Apollo's best gift. According to another account, when the brothers built the treasury for Hyrieus, king of Boeotia, they so constructed it that one stone could be removed allowing them to rob the treasury at will. Agamedes was caught in the act by a trap set by Hyrieus, and Trophonius cut off his brother's head and removed it so that no one would know who the thief was and he would not be implicated. Trophonius was at once swallowed up by the earth. He had an oracle in a cavern at Lebadia in Phocis, which enjoyed great repute for centuries. Croesus and many leading Greeks and Romans consulted it down to historical times. The ritual for consulting the oracle was most intricate, and of such solemnity that suppliants lost their ability to laugh for some time after consulting it; and it came to be said of unusually sober persons that they must have visited Trophonius. Suppliants at the oracle were addressed, once they had penetrated to an inner cavern, by the ghost of Trophonius in the form of a serpent. The payment to the oracle was made in the form of honey cakes. See Lebadia.

Trophonius. In Greek mythology, an ancient earth-god, whose worship was typical of the rites associated with the Chthonian divinities. These rites are in sharp contrast with those of the Olympian gods. (AH)

Tros (trōs). Named by Homer as a son of Erichthonius and a grandson of Dardanus. He gave his name to the Trojans, and the region about Troy, the Troad, is named in honor of him. By his wife Callirrhoë, daughter of the river-god Scamander, he had three sons, Assaracus, Ganymede, and Ilus, and one daughter, Cleopatra. Ganymede, most beautiful of mortals, was taken up into heaven by Zeus to become his cup-bearer. To atone for the loss of his son, Zeus gave Tros his immortal horses. Boreas fell in love with these mares and they bore swift fillies that bounded over the sea. The horses were ultimately inherited by Laomedon, grandson of Tros, who promised them to Heracles but failed to deliver them.

Troy (troi). [Also: Ilium; Latin, Troia, Troja.] Ancient city in Asia Minor, famous in Greek legend as the capital of Priam and the object of the siege by the allied Greeks under Agamemnon. According to legend, the city was founded by Teucer, an immigrant from Crete who was the son of the Cretan river Scamander and the nymph Idaea. From him the people were called Teucrians. In the reign of Teucer, Dardanus came to his kingdom from Samothrace. Teucer gave him land in the region and his daughter Batia in marriage. Dardanus built a city at the foot of Mount Ida which he called Dardania. Tros, the grandson of Dardanus, called his people Trojans and named the city Troy. One son of Tros was Ilus, the father of Laomedon and the grandfather of Priam. Another was Assaracus, the ancestor of Aeneas. And a third son was Ganymede, carried off to Olympus by Zeus. Ilion, the city that Ilus founded in obedience to an oracle, was joined with Dardania and Troy and the whole came to be called Troy or Ilium. The location of Troy near the Hellespont and the entrance to the Propontis and the Euxine Sea, gave it command of trade from the Aegean islands and Greece to the region about the Euxine Sea. It was the strongest power on the coast of Asia Minor. The Trojan War, celebrated in the Iliad of Homer, is now thought to have been waged to destroy this control and to secure access to the lands about the Euxine Sea. According to Homer, the war lasted ten years. The first nine were occupied in raids on the cities of the Troad which supplied and supported Troy, for Priam's rule extended from the island of Lesbos to the Hellespont to Phrygia. In the tenth year the city itself was attacked and finally fell. The date for its fall is c1200 B.C.

The site of this Homeric city was generally believed in antiquity to be identical with that of the Greek Ilium (the modern Hissarlik); and this view has been supported in later times, most notably by Heinrich Schliemann, who followed the descriptions in the Iliad literally and whose explorations (1871 et seq.) at Hissarlik laid bare remains of a series of ancient towns, one above the other. The third and later the second from the bottom he identified with the Homeric town, those levels showing the effects of a conflagration and massive ruins. On the other hand, some scholars regarded the situation of Ilium as irreconcilable with Homer's description of Troy, and preferred a site in the neighborhood of the later Bunarbashi, holding Schliemann's results to be inconclusive. More recent investigations indicate, however, that Schliemann was correct about the site, but that the sixth, or more probably, the seventh level was ancient Ilium. Schliemann's and subsequent excavations on the site have revealed that a city existed there as early as the 3rd millennium B.C. Priam's city, erected on the ruins of earlier cities, was on a mound commanding the plains of the Scamander River and its tributary the Simois. It was larger than the earlier cities and was surrounded by a massive wall, built in the reign of Laomedon, according to legend, by Apollo and Poseidon with the aid of Aeacus. The wall was pierced by gates, of which the Scaean Gate is mentioned in the Iliad. On the highest point within the walls rose the palace-fortress. On the lower slopes were the houses of the inhabitants of the city, remains of which have been found. Gold ornaments and pottery indicate that the city was of the level of the Mycenaean civilization. The city of Troy remained a center of interest throughout antiquity for its historic and legendary significance. Xerxes stopped there on his way to invade Greece (481 B.C.) and offered sacrifices at the shrine of Ilian Athena to the shades of the ancient heroes of the Trojan War. Alexander the Great stopped there, 334 B.C., and saw the arms the heroes of the Trojan War had carried, including the shield of Achilles. The Romans, claiming descent from Trojan Aeneas, honored it. Lucius Scipio offered sacrifice to Ilian Athena. Sulla rebuilt the city after it had been destroyed by his opponent, the Roman general Fimbria. Augustus honored the city and enlarged its territory. After the 4th century A.D. the city fell into ruins, its site was abandoned, and even the location of the

Trygon (tri'gon). Some say the infant Asclepius, son of Apollo and Coronis, was exposed to die near Thelpusa, in Arcadia. He was found by Autolaus, an illegitimate son of Arcas, and was given to Trygon who nursed him.

Tubantes (tū-ban'tēz). Ancient Germanic tribe located on the right bank of the Rhenus (Rhine) in territory afterward occupied by the Usipetes. Ptolemy, however, places the tribe further to the south, near the Chatti.

Tuder (tū'dēr). [Modern name, Todi.] In ancient geography, an Umbrian town of C Italy, situated on a height above the Tiber River, about 23 miles S of Perugia (Perugia). It has Etruscan and Roman antiquities, including walls, a temple, and a theater. Objects found here are in the museum at Florence and in the Vatican at Rome.

Tullia (tul'i-ā). In Roman legend, one of two daughters of Servius Tullius. She was the wife of Aruns, brother of Tarquin (Lucius Tarquinius). She murdered her husband, and Tarquin, having killed his wife, married her, slew Servius Tullius, and proclaimed himself king. Tullia rode to the Senate house to greet her husband as king, and on her return drove over the dead body of her father, which lay in the way. The street through which she passed thereafter bore the name Vicus Sceleratus ("Abominable Street").

Tullia. Daughter of Cicero and Terentia; born c76 B.C.; died at Tusculum, 45 B.C. The beloved Tulliola of Cicero's Letters, she was the wife first of Calpurnius Piso, later of Furius Crassipes, and finally of Publius Cornelius Dolabella.

Tullus Hostilius (tul'us hos-til'i-us). According to tradition, the third king of Rome (672-640 B.C.). His grandfather Hostilius fought against the Sabines in the war that followed the rape of the Sabine women by Romulus and his followers. Tullus, who succeeded the pious and peace-loving Numa, was even more warlike than Romulus. The relations between Rome and the city of Alba were strained because of a series of cattle raids. Tullus prepared to make war on Alba. However, Mettius Fufetius, leader of the Alban forces, convinced him that they would be foolish to fight; they would only weaken each other and become prey for the Etruscans. Since one or the other city must sometime be the ruler of both, Mettius proposed that the issue be decided by single combat. A set of male triplets, the Curiatii, from the Alban side, engaged a set of male triplets, the Horatii, from the Roman side. The Horatii won and Rome thus won dominion over Alba. In a later war that Tullus waged against Fidenae and Veii, Mettius, his supposed ally, endeavored to betray Tullus for it galled him that Alba was subordinate to Rome. Tullus discovered his strategy and outwitted him, but when the war was over Tullus exposed the treachery of Mettius and had him torn to pieces by horses. Tullus did not accuse the Alban soldiers of treachery, for they were only obeying orders. He removed the Albans to Rome, gave them the citizenship, and even named some of them as senators. As for the city of Alba, which according to legend had been founded 400 years before this time, he destroyed it utterly except for its temples. He added the Caelian Hill to the city of Rome to make room for the expanded population, and built his own house there, so that from his time it was the custom for the kings of Rome to live on the Caelian Hill. He built a Senate chamber, named for him the Curia Hostilia, which was used until its destruction by fire in 52 B.C. Tullus declared war on the Sabines and defeated them. With all his wars, Tullus had neglected the rites owed to the gods. A rain of stones fell on Alba and a voice commanded the people to make sacrifices for nine days. Plague broke out in Rome. Tullus was one of those afflicted. He hurriedly revived the religious rites of Numa but it was too late. His house was struck by a thunderbolt and he was consumed in the flames.

Turnus (tēr'nus). In Roman legend, the king of the Rutulians in Italy at the period of the arrival of the Trojans under Aeneas. His family origin was Mycenaean and he was a descendant of Inachus and Acrisius, as well as of Pilumnus. He was the handsome suitor of Lavinia, daughter of Latinus. His suit was favored by Lavinia's mother. Alecto the Fury visited him in his palace in Ardea in the guise of an aged priestess and told him of rumors that Lavinia was to be married to Aeneas. As this did not rouse him sufficiently, Alecto revealed herself and planted a firebrand in his heart which enraged him and led him to call for war on Aeneas. He was informed by Iris, sent by Juno, that Aeneas was temporarily absent from his company of Trojans and that this would be a good time to attack. He attacked, although Latinus disapproved the war. To encourage his men he compared his cause to that of Menelaus, and said that once again the Trojans had started a war by stealing a bride. But he, he declared, would not resort to stratagems as the Greeks had done. He would fight in the open and win by arms, not by wiles. He wrought havoc among the Trojans whom he attacked in their garrison. By mistake he was cut off inside the Trojan fort. He slashed about murderously, killing many before he was forced to give ground. He retreated slowly and at last jumped into the Tiber to save himself. In later struggles Juno and his sister Juturna tried to save him by luring him away from the battle field, but he was a valiant, fearless fighter, and as soon as he discovered that they had duped him, he returned to the thick of the struggle. He refused all suggestions and pleas by Latinus to make peace with the Trojans, and insisted that he would repel the Trojan invaders. He slew Pallas, the son of Evander who had come to aid Aeneas, and tore off Pallas' sword belt on which scenes from the story of the Danaids were depicted. This sword belt, which he now girt on himself, led to his death. After great bloodshed Turnus met Aeneas in single combat to decide the issue. Jove sent an owl to plague him and it was a sign that Turnus' hours were numbered. He fought savagely but was wounded and fell. Aeneas would have spared him, but he caught sight of the sword belt of Pallas, which Turnus was wearing, and to avenge Pallas he thrust his sword through Turnus' throat.

Tuscany (tus'kə-ni). Region in C Italy, bounded on the N and E by the main range of the Apennines, on the W by the Ligurian and Tyrrhenian seas, and on the S by the regions of Umbria and Latium. It was the home of the Etruscans, and one of the earliest objects of Roman expansion.

Tusculum (tus'kū-lum). In ancient geography, a city in Latium, Italy, situated in the Alban Hills about 13 miles SE of Rome, near the modern Frascati. According to tradition its chief, Mamilius, joined Tarquinius Superbus against the Romans. Later it was allied with Rome. Under the Republic and Empire it contained villas of many Romans (Lucullus, Pompey, Brutus, and Cicero). It was destroyed near the end of the 12th century. Its ruins contain a Roman amphitheater and a theater.

Tutula (tō-tō'lə). [Also: called by some, Philotis.] In Roman legend, a serving-maid of the first half of the 4th century B.C. The Latins threatened war against Rome, and demanded Roman free-born virgins as wives. The magistrates were in a quandary as to how to deal with the demand. Tutula proposed that she and other pretty serving-maids, dressed as free-born brides, should be sent to the Latins, and she would contrive that the Latins would be defeated. The Roman magistrates took her advice and sent her and a number of others dressed as brides to the enemy. During the night, the Roman maidens went about the enemy camp and stole the swords of the sleeping warriors. Tutula climbed a fig tree and, holding her cloak behind her to hide its light, signalled with a torch to the Romans that it was safe to attack. Roman soldiers poured into the camp and slew the sleeping, weaponless Latins.

about 75 miles NW of the modern Adana. It was the birthplace of Apollonius of Tyana, a 1st-century A.D. wandering teacher and sage.

Tyche (tī'kē). In Greek mythology, the goddess of fortune. Some say she was the daughter of Zeus, by whom she was given the power to decide the lot of individual mortals. She could assure prosperity, wealth, and good luck, but she might capriciously deprive one of all good fortune for no reason at all, or because the beneficiary of her gifts failed to make proper sacrifices to her. The overwhelming aspect of Tyche was her uncertainty. She became identified with the Roman Fortuna and, like her, is depicted with the cornucopia of plenty and the wheel of fortune.

Tychius (tī'ki-us). In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Boeotian leather-worker who made the sevenfold spear-proof bull's-hide shield of Telamonian Ajax.

Tydeus (tī'dūs, tīd'ē-us). In Greek legend, a son of Oeneus of Calydon. Some say he killed his brother, others say he killed his cousins, and still others say any deaths that he caused were accidental. In any case, he was banished from Calydon and went to the court of Adrastus, king of Argos. There he quarreled with Polynices, son of Oedipus, who had been banished from Thebes. Adrastus separated them and was reminded of an oracle which advised him to yoke his daughters in marriage to a boar and a lion. He gave his daughter Deïpyle to Tydeus, who had the device of a boar painted on his shield, and promised to restore Tydeus to his lands. Deïpyle bore Diomedes to Tydeus. Adrastus first proposed to restore Polynices, who bore the device of a lion on his shield and to whom he gave his daughter Aegia (or Argia), to the throne of Thebes. Tydeus, in the expectation that he would be restored on the successful completion of the expedition, was eager to march against Thebes and was one of the Seven who made up the leaders of the expedition. He was sent as an envoy to Thebes to demand the restoration of Polynices. The Thebans refused. Tydeus then challenged the leading Theban warriors to single combat, and overcame each of his opponents until no more dared to meet him. On his way to rejoin the Argives where they had stopped at Cithaeron, he was set upon by 50 Theban warriors who attacked him from ambush. He killed them all except Maeon, whom he allowed to escape. In the attack on Thebes Tydeus was wounded by Melanippus. But as Tydeus was a favorite of Athena, the goddess came hurrying up with a drug she had procured from Zeus that would cure him and make him immortal. But Amphiaraus, who hated Tydeus because he was one of the causes of the war against Thebes, cut off Melanippus' head (some say Tydeus, though wounded, had killed Melanippus, others say it was Amphiaraus), and gave it to Tydeus, pretending it would cure him. Tydeus split the skull and gulped down the brains of Melanippus. Athena, arriving on the scene at that moment, was so revolted by this sight that she refrained from giving Tydeus the magic drug that would have immortalized him, and he died of his wound. Some say Maeon, in gratitude for being spared by Tydeus, buried his body.

Tylissus (tī-lis'us). In ancient geography, a town on the E slope of Mount Ida on the island of Crete. It was the site of a Minoan palace built about 1600 B.C. Many valuable objects of the Minoan civilization have been recovered from the site.

Tyndareus (tin-dār'i-us). In Greek legend, a son of Gorgophone, daughter of Perseus, and Oebalus, king of Sparta. His brothers were Icarius and Hippocoön. He succeeded his father to the throne but was driven out by Hippocoön and his sons, and fled to Thestius, king of Aetolia. There he married Leda, daughter of Thestius, who bore Helen, Castor and Polydeuces, and Clytemnestra. Some say Castor and Clytemnestra were the children of Tyndareus, the others having been fathered by Zeus. Others say only Clytemnestra was his child. But he passed as the father of them all. Once when sacrificing to the gods, Tyndareus carelessly forgot Aphrodite. To punish him, Aphrodite caused his daughters to become notorious adulteresses. Tyndareus was restored to the throne of Sparta by Heracles. Helen had so many powerful suitors that he feared to give her to any one of them lest the others turn on him in wrath. In return for his promise to help Odysseus win Penelope, daughter of Icarius, Odysseus advised him to require the suitors to take an oath that they would come to the aid of the man who married Helen if any ill should come to him as a result of his marriage. Tyndareus followed this advice and, all the suitors having taken the oath, awarded his beautiful daughter to Menelaus, who also became his heir on the death of Castor and Polydeuces. Tyndareus also compelled Thyestes to relinquish the throne of Mycenae to Agamemnon, and forgave Agamemnon for slaying Clytemnestra's husband and making her his wife by force. Some say that Tyndareus and Leda reared their grandson Orestes following the death of Agamemnon, but when Orestes later killed Clytemnestra and her lover, Tyndareus caused him to be brought to trial for matricide. Tyndareus, whose tomb was at Sparta, was one of those said to have been raised from the dead by Asclepius.

Tyndaris (tin'da-ris). A name applied to a

Typhon (tī'fōn). [Also: Typhoeus.] In Greek mythology, the son of Gaea, who in anger over the defeat of her sons the Titans, by Zeus, lay with Tartarus and produced Typhon in a cave in Cilicia. He was a tremendous monster, whose body consisted of snakes from the hips down. On his long arms he had serpents heads in place of hands. By Echidna, Typhon was the father of many monsters: Cerberus, the Hydra, the Chimaera, Orthrus, the Sphinx of Thebes, the dragon that guarded the Golden Fleece, and some say he was also the father of the Nemean Lion and of the eagle that daily gnawed at the liver of Prometheus. Incited thereto by Gaea, Typhon attacked Zeus and the Olympian gods. They fled, taking the form of various animals to escape him. Zeus hurled a thunderbolt and a sickle at him and burned and wounded him. Typhon fled, but when Zeus overtook him he overcame Zeus and cut the sinews of his hands and feet. He took Zeus to the cave in Cilicia, set a dragon to guard him, and hid the sinews. Hermes and Pan came to the cave and succeeded in stealing the sinews and restoring them to the god. Now that he could move again Zeus pursued Typhon with his thunderbolts. Typhon fled to Thrace and hurled mountains at Zeus, but Zeus struck him over and over again, and Typhon, wounded, made off. Some say he wandered to Egypt and lies beneath a lake there. Others say he went to Sicily and that there Zeus buried him under Mount Aetna. As Typhoeus, Typhon was the personification of violent, hot windstorms.

Tyre (tīr). [Arabic, Es Sur; French, Sour, Tyr; Latin, Tyrus; Hebrew, Zor; called "Queen of the Sea."] Most important and, next to Sidon, the oldest city of Phoenicia; now a town in Lebanon. It consisted of a town on the mainland, which was the oldest part, and two rocky islands directly opposite. These islands originally contained only the temple of Melkarth and warehouses. In the 13th century B.C. they were more settled, and were later united by Hiram, the contemporary of Solomon, by an embankment. In the 11th century B.C. Tyre began, under its first king, father of Hiram, to rival its mother city Sidon, and soon supplanted it as queen of the Phoenician cities. Of its magnificence and luxury the prophet Ezekiel gives a detailed description. It established colonies in Sicily, Sardinia, Spain, Africa (Carthage), and sent out mercantile fleets as far as India and Brittany. Under Hiram Tyre reached the height of its prosperity and splendor. It then came into close friendly relations with Israel. Later, Ahab, king of Israel, married Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, whose great-granddaughter Elissa (Dido) is said to have founded Carthage. Tyre was often the aim of attacks by Eastern rulers. It became tributary to Assyria under Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 B.C.). Shalmaneser IV (727-722 B.C.) besieged it for five years, apparently without success. Under Nebuchadnezzar it stood a siege of 13 years (585-572 B.C.). Later it came under Persian supremacy. Alexander the Great reduced the city after a siege of nine months (332 B.C.), though he did not completely destroy it. From this blow Tyre never fully recovered, but it continued to have a degree of prosperity through its manufactures of metalwork, fine textiles, and purple dye. In the Roman period Tyre was still a prosperous city, and it retained some importance down to the Middle Ages. During the Crusades it often changed hands between the Christians and the Moham-medans, and was repeatedly destroyed.

Tyro (tī'rō). In Greek mythology, the beautiful daughter of Salmoneus and Alcidence. She was seduced by Sisyphus, her uncle, and bore him two sons, whom she destroyed. Her stepmother Sidero treated her cruelly. In Elis, to which Salmoneus had gone from Thessaly, Tyro fell in love with the river-god Enipeus, and spent many lonely hours on the banks of his river wooing him. But Enipeus did not respond to her overtures. Instead Poseidon took advantage of the situation. He disguised himself as Enipeus and invited Tyro to join him at the river. After casting her into a deep sleep he raised up a great wave to hide him and ravished Tyro. She bore him twin sons, Pelias and Neleus, but exposed them on the mountain rather than subject herself to the anger of her stepmother by acknowledging her children. Some say she put the children in a chest and set them afloat on the Enipeus River, but in either case, they were saved, and when they grew up they avenged their mother for the cruel treatment she had suffered at Sidero's hands by killing the latter. Tyro married Cretheus, who founded Iolcus and was another of her uncles, and by him was the mother of Aeson, Amythaon, and Pheres.

Tyrrhenians (ti-rē'ni-anz). An ancient people, said to be Lydians who emigrated to Italy under the leadership of Tyrrhenus of Lydia, from whom they took their name. It is thought that these Tyrrhenians were the ancestors of the Etruscans.

Tyrrhenus (ti-rē'nus). According to Greek tradition, a son of Atys of Lydia. In his time a great famine afflicted the land. According to Herodotus, the Lydians sought to alleviate their distress by the invention of all manner of games, and lived according to the following schedule: one day they so occupied themselves with the games that they had no desire to eat, the next day they ate and played no games. In this way they went on for 18 years. The famine persisted, however, and the king decided to divide his nation and, as the result of the drawing of lots, to send one-half over the sea to a new land under the leadership of his son Tyrrhenus. In this way the Lydians under Tyrrhenus went to Umbria in Italy, and colonized that land. Afterward they took the name Tyrrhenians from their leader.

Tyrrheus (tī'rūs) or Tyrrhus (-rus). In Roman legend, a shepherd of King Latinus. He had a pet stag that tamely followed wherever he went or, if it wandered off, returned to its stall on the farm of Tyrrheus at night. Alecto, commanded by Juno to stir up the Rutulian peasants against Aeneas and the Trojans, caused Ascanius to kill the stag, unaware that it was a pet. The Rutuli were aroused to a great pitch of anger against the Trojans for this incident, and it was one of the precipitating causes of the war between the Trojans and the people of

Tyrtæus (têr-tē'us). Greek elegiac poet of Sparta, active in the middle of the 7th century B.C. He was so successful in encouraging the Spartans in the Second Messenian War that the Athenians claimed he was originally from Attica. According to their tradition, the Spartans, during this war, were commanded by the oracle to take a leader from among the Athenians. The latter, not wishing to offend the oracle by denying a man to the Spartans, and at the same time not wishing to lend any aid or comfort to the Spartans, sent Tyrtæus, a lame schoolmaster of no reputation. After their defeat by the Messenians at the battle of the Boar's Tomb, the Spartans were discouraged and afraid, but Tyrtæus so inspired them with his poems, which they sang as they marched into battle, that they renewed the fight and beat the Messenians. Fragments of his poems are extant.

Made tributary to the Suevi, they sought Roman aid and protection in 55 B.C. Later (38 B.C.) Agrippa brought them across the Rhine. Their principal place, named Colonia Agrippina (modern Cologne), became the chief seat of Roman power on the lower Rhine. Tacitus mentions that the Ubii later called themselves Agrippinenses. They were merged ultimately with the Franks.

Ucalegon (ū-kal'e-gon). Named by Homer (Iliad) as a Trojan elder and counselor of Priam. In the Aeneid he is further described as a friend of Anchises. Aeneas speaks of the burning of his house on the night the Greeks descended from the Wooden Horse and destroyed Troy.

According to some accounts, Urania was the mother of the poet Linus by Apollo. See Muses.

Urania. An epithet of Aphrodite in her aspect as a goddess of the heavens, meaning "Heavenly." This epithet was also applied to Aphrodite in her role as the goddess of pure and spiritual love.

Uranus (ū'rā-nus, ū-rā'nus). In Greek mythology, the god and personification of the sky. Some say he was the first ruler of the world, and that he received his scepter from Nyx (Night). According to others he was the first child of Gaea, born while she slept. The gentle, fertile rains he sent on her caused trees and verdure to grow, and brought forth the mountains as well. His children by Gaea were: the Hecatonchires, Briareus, Cottus, and Gyges, who each had 100 hands and were the most terrible of the sons of Uranus and Gaea; the Cyclopes, Arges, Steropes, and Brontes, tyrannoussouled giants who had one eye in the middle of their foreheads, and who gave the thunderbolts to Zeus; the Titans, Oceanus, Coeus, Hyperion, Crius, Iapetus, and Cronus who hated his father; the Titanesses, Tethys, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, and Thia. Uranus hated the Cyclopes and hid them in Tartarus. This so aroused the fury of Gaea that she plotted with the Titans to destroy Uranus. While he slept, all the Titans except Oceanus attacked him. Cronus used a sickle that had been forged by the Telchines and given to him by Gaea to cut off his father's genitals. He flung them and the sickle into the sea. Drops of blood falling on Gaea (Earth) from the dismembered parts of Uranus caused Gaea to produce the Erinyes (Furies), the Melic nymphs, and some say Aphrodite was born from the foam which was caused when Uranus' genitals fell into the sea. Some say the sickle that Cronus hurled from him fell into the sea near Drepanum in Sicily. After the mutilation of Uranus the Titans released their brothers, the Cyclopes, and made Cronus their ruler, but as Uranus was dying he prophesied that Cronus would also be dethroned by one of his own children.

Urbibentum (ér-bi-ben'tum). [Called in the Middle Ages, Urbs Vetus, whence the modern name Orvieto.] A walled town in Umbria, about 60 miles N of Rome, on a volcanic hill thought by some to be the site of the once wealthy Etruscan city of Volsinii, which the Romans destroyed in 280 B.C. In the neighborhood have been found prehistoric antiquities and an Etruscan cemetery. Bronzes and Greek vases from the cemetery are exhibited in the local museum. Fragments of architectural decoration in terracotta, discovered with the walls, indicate the presence of an Italic (or Etruscan) temple. (JJ)

Ursa Major (ér'sā mā'jor). The most prominent constellation of the northern heavens, representing a bear with an enormous tail. There is a rival figure for the same constellation—a wagon. Both figures are mentioned by Homer. The name of the bear is translated from some original Aryan language, since the constellation in Sanskrit is called riksha—a word which means in different genders a "bear" and a "star." As the seven stars of the Great Bear are in many languages called the Septentrions, it is probable the figure of the bear, which by its tail would seem to have originated among some people not familiar with bears, may have been the result of a confusion of sound. Draco appears to have had formerly a longer tail, twisting down in front of Ursa Major.

Ursa Minor (mī'nor). A constellation near the north pole, the figure of which imitates that of Ursa Major, which its configuration resembles. It also has a rival figure of a wagon, and is sometimes called the Cynosure, which seems to mean "dog's tail." During the greater part of history sailors have steered by Ursa Minor as a whole.

Usipetes (ū-sip'e-tēz). [Also: Usipes, Usipii.] Ancient Germanic tribe, first mentioned by Caesar, who describes them as having been driven by the Suevi (59 B.C.), together with the Tencteri, from their original homes. With the Tencteri they were defeated by Caesar on the W bank of the Rhine, whence they withdrew to the opposite side, to the north of the Sugambri. Ptolemy, who names them for the last time, places them further to the south, in the Main region. They were probably merged ultimately in the Alamanni. Utica (ū'ti-kā). In ancient geography, a city in Africa, situated near the Bagradas (modern Medjerda) River, about 25 miles NW of Carthage. It was founded by the Phoenicians (c1100 B.C.), sided in the Third Punic War with Rome, and succeeded Carthage as the leading city in Africa. It was held by Cato for the Pompeians in 46 B.C. Following the victory of Caesar at Thapsus Cato committed suicide there.

Vacuna (vā-kū'nā). Ancient Sabine goddess. She was probably originally a goddess of agriculture, but the Romans later identified her variously with Victoria, Bellona, and Venus.

Vadimonis, Lacus (vad-i-mō'nis, lā'kus). In ancient geography, a small lake in Italy, near the Tiber River; the modern Laghetto di Bassano. Here the Romans under Fabius Maximus Rullianus defeated (310 or 309 B.C.) the Etruscans; in 283 B.C. the Romans defeated the combined north Italians and Gauls here.

Valens (vā'lēnz), Fabius. One of the principal generals of Vitellius; fl. 69 A.D. He defeated Otho at Bedriacum.

Vale of Tempe (tem'pē). See Tempe, Vale of.

Valerius (vā-lir'i-us), Marcus. [Surnamed Corvus.] Roman general; born c371 B.C.; died c270 B.C. He distinguished himself in the First Samnite War. He is said to have won his surname when, having accepted single combat with a giant Gaul, he was aided by a raven that flew in the face of his opponent and enabled Valerius to win.

Valerius, Publius. Real name of Publicola; (q.v.).

Valerius Antias (an'ti-as, -shi-as). Roman analyst; fl. in the first part of the 1st century B.C. He wrote a history of Rome in 75 books from the origins to his own time.

Valerius Flaccus (flak'us), Caius. Roman poet of the time of Vespasian, author of an armchair epic, the Argonautica, a Latin version, in eight books of limited merit, of the adventures of Jason and his companions in the Argo, which in Greek is represented by the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius. The Roman poet Publius Terentius Varro Atacinus, in the 1st century B.C., also wrote an epic Argonautica of which fragments survive. (JJ)

Valerius Maximus (mak'si-mus). Roman rhetorician and historian; fl. in the first part of the 1st century A.D. Of his life nothing is known except that he accompanied Sextus Pompeius to Asia in 27 A.D. He dedicated to Tiberius a collection of anecdotes collected for rhetorical purposes.

Vangiones (van-jī'ō-nēz). Ancient Germanic actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; ƒh, then; d as d or j, s as s or sh, t as t or ch, z as z or zh.

tribe first mentioned by Caesar as in the army of Ariovistus. The Vangiones were situated on the left side of the middle Rhene (Rhine), in the region about Borbetomagus (later, Augusta Vangionum, modern Worms). They were probably merged ultimately with the Alamanni.

Varini (vā-rī'nī). Ancient Germanic people who dwelt near the Mare Suevicum (Baltic Sea) between the Albis (Elbe) and Viadua (Oder) rivers.

Varius Rufus (vār'i-us rō'fus), Lucius. Roman elegiac, epic, and tragic poet; fl. in the last part of the 1st century B.C. He was an older contemporary and friend of Vergil, who left him and Plotius Tucca his literary remains on his death in 19 B.C. Varius Rufus and Plotius Tucca were ordered by Augustus to disregard Vergil's request that the manuscript of the Aeneid be burned if anything should happen to him, and as Vergil's literary executors to edit and publish the Aeneid. Varius' great tragic poem, Thyestes, was presented at the Actian Games and he was rewarded by Augustus with a large sum of money. Of this work, as of his other epic poems, only fragments survive.

Varro (var'ō), Caius Terentius. Roman politician; died after 200 B.C. He became consul, with Lucius Aemilius Paulus, in 216 B.C., and loudly criticized the harrying tactics of Fabius in the war against Hannibal. He boasted that he would defeat the enemy in a day, collected a force of 80,000-90,000 men and, in defiance of all advice, sought the enemy. He engaged Hannibal at Cannae in Apulia, and suffered a catastrophic defeat. According to some accounts, 50,000 Romans fell and 10,000-20,000 were taken captive. It was the most terrible defeat the Romans had ever sustained.

Varro, Marcus Terentius. Roman scholar and author, the most learned of the Romans of his time. He was born at Reate, Italy, 116 B.C.; died c27 B.C. He did not confine himself to scholarly pursuits, but held various public offices, and rose to the praetorship. He joined the party of Pompey, but was reconciled with Caesar (47 B.C.) and was made by him director of the great public library. Henceforth he took no part in politics. Nevertheless, he was proscribed by Antony (43 B.C.), in the Second Triumvirate, but was saved by his friends. The total number of his works is about 74, comprising 620 books. Of these only two, De Lingua Latina, dedicated to Caesar, and De Re Rustica, survive (the former only in part). Among his lost books are a work on geometry, one on mensuration, and a nine-book encyclopedia, covering grammar, dialectics, rhetoric, geometry, arithmetic, astrology, music, medicine, and architecture. His historical and archaeological studies, quoted by later writers, are the indirect source of much of our modern knowledge concerning ancient Rome.

Varro, Publius Terentius. [Surnamed Atacinus.] Roman poet; born at Atax, in Narbonensis, 82 B.C.; died c37 B.C. Following the Alexandrian school, he was the author of the epic Argonautica, a work fashioned after that of Apollonius of Rhodes. Only fragments of his works survive.

Varus (vār'us), Publius Quintilius. Roman general. He was consul (13 B.C.), governor in Syria (6-4 B.C.), and commander in Germany (6-9 A.D.). His rigorous measures led to a German alliance against him, and he was totally defeated by Arminius in the famous battle in the Teutoburger Wald (9 A.D.). When he saw that the battle was lost, he fell upon his sword. The three legions under his command were massacred to a man. This defeat profoundly affected the Romans; henceforth they abandoned the idea of a frontier on the Albis (Elbe). Augustus bitterly mourned the loss of the three legions, and the anniversary of the loss was observed in Rome as a day of mourning.

Vascones (vas-kō'nēz). People which dwelt in the N part of ancient Spain, the predecessors of the present Basques. They were subjugated by Augustus. When the Roman Empire disintegrated, they became subject to the Visigoths, but freed themselves at the end of the 6th century A.D., at which time they migrated northward and settled Vasconia, now Gascony.

Vase-painting. From the variety and domesticity of the subjects treated, Greek vase-painting is of the greatest importance for the light shed by it upon every phase of ancient life; and from the art side it is equally valuable, not only from the fine decorative and creative quality which it frequently shows, but from the information that it supplies regarding the great art of Greek wall and easel painting, which has almost entirely perished. Painted ware in Crete in the Early Minoan Period (2800–2000 B.C.; a date for the beginning of the period somewhat later than that suggested by Sir Arthur Evans) consisted of simple designs—bands, wavy lines, plumes, curvilinear patterns—in dark paint on light and light paint on dark backgrounds, using black, varying shades of red, and white. Middle Minoan (2000–1550 B.C.) adds naturalistic lily and other plant patterns. In the Late Minoan Period (1550–1100 B.C.), designs inspired by marine life, as befitted a sea power, are widely employed. Octopuses, dolphins, fish, shells, and marine growths, first naturalistic and later stylized, with the occasional admission of the human figure, are skillfully accommodated to the shapes and surfaces that they decorate. On the Greek mainland a parallel development occurred in the Mycenaean Age (c1600–1100 B.C.), so called from its center about Mycenae. Following the Dorian invasion (c1100 B.C.), a geometric style of decoration replaces the patterns of the Minoan-Mycenaean Period. Formal arrangements, in bands or zones, of parallel lines, zigzags, swastikas, meanders or variations of the key design, and checkerboards completely cover the vase, and give to this period the name Geometric. Later in the period (9th and 8th centuries B.C.) the Attic potters, particularly, produced huge amphorae, some as much as five feet high, which in addition to the geometric zones sometimes carry a scenic frieze. Slim, angular human figures, drawn schematically in silhouette, appear in the friezes, the designs becoming freer with the advance of time. Called Dipylon vases, because many of them were found in the cemeteries outside the Dipylon Gate of Athens, and often used as monuments on graves, many of these show some part of the funeral ritual or procession in the frieze inserted between zones of geometric patterns. In the 8th and 7th centuries, increased trade activity with the cities of Ionia and beyond led to the introduction of Oriental motifs in vase decoration—palmettes, lotuses, rosettes, friezes of fabulous monsters, spirals. Geometric patterns gradually disappear as the space reserved for a pictorial panel increases. On the mainland of Greece, Corinth was the most important center for the production of vases in the Ionic style. The characteristic feature of the Corinthian style is the superposition of bands of animals and monsters, with rosettes and elaborate flowered and fringed borders, the whole following very closely the Assyrian and Phrygian metalwork and embroideries, which were abundantly imported into Greece at this time. Proto-Corinthian vases (725–640 B.C.) progressed from a highly developed geometric style on small vessels, through a stage where friezes of monsters and animals predominated, to a late phase in which the decoration consists of finely executed miniature paintings, generally of mythological subjects. The class of vessels, larger on the whole, called Corinthian (c640–550 B.C.), continue the use of friezes of animals and then developed, in the 7th century, the technique known as the black-figure style. This style, perfected at Corinth and adopted by Athenian potters, shows little Oriental influence; it is thoroughly Hellenic. In black-figure the decoration is painted in black silhouette directly on the clay. Details within the silhouette are incised with a graver. Occasionally red, purple, or white are sparingly used for decorative accent. The subjects of the masters of the black-figure style are most often from mythology; Heracles, for example, with the great variety of his adventures, is a favorite subject; Theseus and Perseus are also popular. Scenes from daily life begin to appear. The drawing is strong and archaic; the effect is decorative. The heads of the human figures are in profile, but the eye is full face. Men's eyes are round, women's are almond-shaped. The flesh of women is white. Bodies are in profile or with the shoulders and chest front view, the hips and legs in profile. Among the masters of the black-figure technique are Timonidas of Corinth (early 6th century B.C.); his contemporary, Sophilos of Athens (q.v.); Nearchus (q.v.), painter and potter; Exekias (q.v.), painter and potter; Cleitias (q.v.), painter who worked with the potter Ergotimus; the Amasis Painter (q.v.); and the Tleson Painter (q.v.).

Athens eclipsed Corinth as the center of the production of painted vases. A new technique developed there, the red-figure style, in which the background is painted black and the reddish color of the vessel itself is reserved for the figures. Details of the figures are drawn in black or a diluted black. The advantage of this technique is that it liberates the artist from the engraver, the brush giving greater fluidity than the graving tool. The black ground also heightens and sets off the red figures. At the same time, it intensifies the design effect. The black-figure and red-figure style existed side by side for many years. Indeed some masters, as Epictetus (q.v.) and the Andocides Painter (q.v.), worked in both, and on occasion used both on the same vessel, black-figure on one side and red-figure on the other. Toward the end of the first quarter of the 5th century B.C., however, the red-figure superseded the black-figure, except in the decoration of Panathenaic amphorae, which, by tradition, continued to be painted in black-figure and in a traditional archaic manner. Subjects of the red-figure artists are at first from mythology, then increasingly from daily life, as, the potter's shop, the shoemaker's shop, the music lesson, feasting and dancing, etc. Over 500 artists of the red-figure style have been identified, not, however, by their own names. Their identities are variously indicated, sometimes from the potter who is known to have thrown their vessels, as the Cleophrades Painter (q.v.), the Brygos Painter (q.v.), Pistoxenus Painter, Sosias Painter (q.v.), Sotades Painter; sometimes from a distinctive subject of their paintings, as the Penthesilea Painter, Pan Painter, Niobid Painter, Achilles Painter; sometimes from the location of an example of their work, as the Berlin Painter, Chicago Painter, Providence Painter. Among those whose names are known are: Euthymides (q.v.), Euphronius (q.v.), Onesimus (q.v.), Duris (q.v.), Phintias (q.v.), Oltos (q.v.), Myson (q.v.), and Macron (q.v.).

Another technique, employed generally only for the interiors of kylixes and for the decoration of lecythi, covered the natural clay with a white or creamy slip, and used this as a surface for painting outline figures in various colors. Greek vase-painting reached its height in the 5th century B.C. Attic ware was distributed throughout the Mediterranean region. Many of the surviving examples were found outside the borders of the Greek mainland. After the 5th century the quality of painted vases declined, but the art survived until the 3rd century, when painted pottery was no longer produced.

Vediovis (vē'd'yō-vis). [Also: Vedius, Vejovis.] See Veiovis.

Veii (vē'i). In ancient geography, a city in Italy, the most important of the Etruscan League, about 11 miles NW of Rome. It was frequently at war with Rome, especially in behalf of the restoration of Tarquinius Superbus. It was besieged and taken by the Romans under the leadership of Camillus in 396 B.C. Roman references to Veii as a center of fine sculpture in terra-cotta have been borne out by excavations both clandestine and official, which have produced striking figures of gods, Apollo, Artemis, and others, in the Villa Giulia Museum in Rome. According to Pliny the Elder, a Veientine sculptor named Vulca made terra-cotta statues for the Capitolium in Rome. Under the Empire the city sank into obscurity. In Rome, on the W side of the Piazza Colonna, is a portico of ancient Ionic columns, removed from Veii in 1838 and reërected here. (JJ)

Veiovis (vē'yō-vis). A Roman deity, possibly of Etruscan origin, regarded by some scholars as a sort of anti-Jupiter, a god of the dead. He was represented as a youth, armed with arrows and accompanied by a goat.

Velabrum (vē-lā'brum). Area in ancient Rome, between the Capitoline and Palatine hills and the Tiber River, extending NE to the Forum Romanum. It was a marsh before the construction of the Cloaca Maxima.

Velia (vē'li-ā). Locality in ancient Rome, identified as the ridge which extends from the Palatine Hill to the Esquiline Hill, and on which stand the Temple of Venus and Roma and the Arch of Titus. As it now exists, it has been much cut down from its original height.

Velia. The Italic name of Elea, a Greek colony on the coast of Lucania in Magna Graecia. It was said to have been founded (540 B.C.) by Phocaeans who emigrated fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte, mōve, nōr,

from Asia Minor rather than submit to Persia. It was the center of the Eleatic School of philosophy. (JJ)

Velinus (vē-lí'nus). [Modern name, Velino.] River in C Italy which joins the Nar (Nera) above Interamna (Terni). Near its mouth is the noted waterfall Cascade delle Marmore, consisting of a series of three cascades.

Vellum. Leather, or perhaps more correctly calfskin, especially when used as a writing material. Of the oldest manuscripts which have survived to our time, a great number are on vellum, whose durability has enabled them to withstand centuries of handling and haphazard storage. (JJ)

Venedi (vē-nēd'i). [Also: Vends, Veneds.] Name applied by Tacitus and Pliny to an ancient people living along the right bank of the Vistula. Tacitus classified them as Germans; they are, however, considered to have been the ancestors of the Wends.

Venelia (vē-nē'li-ā). In the Aeneid, a nymph, the mother of Aeneas' Rutulian enemy Turnus.

Veneti (ven'e-ti). Ancient Celtic people of NW Gaul, who carried on a considerable trade with Britain. They were defeated by Caesar in 56 B.C., in a naval engagement. The name survives in the town of Vannes.

Veneti. [Also: Heneti.] Ancient people of Italy, dwelling near the head of the Adriatic, beyond the Padus (Po) and Athesis (Adige) rivers. During the Second Punic War the Veneti passed under Roman rule. Their principal towns were Patavium (Padua) and Ateste (Este). Inscriptions from the 5th to 1st centuries B.C. indicate that they spoke an Illyrian language.

Venulus (ven'ū-lus). In the Aeneid, an Italian who joined Turnus in the war against Aeneas. He was sent by Turnus to Diomedes' city to ask his aid. On his return he reported that Diomedes advised Turnus and the Latins to come to terms with Aeneas. He refused to lend Turnus any aid, for he had had enough of fighting Trojans.

Venus (vē'nus). In Roman mythology, the goddess of grace and love. Originally she was an Italic goddess of gardens and growth, and only at a comparatively late period became identified with the Greek goddess of love, Aphrodite. In medieval times her name became synonymous with earthly love as contrasted with spiritual love.

Venus de Milo (mī'lō). [Also: Venus of Melos.] Greek statue in the Louvre, Paris, perhaps the most admired single existing work of antiquity. It was found in 1829 on the island of Melos, and in date appears to fall between the time of Phidias and that of Praxiteles, or c400 B.C. The statue represents a majestic woman, undraped to the hips, standing with the weight on the right foot and with the head turned slightly toward the left. The arms are broken off, and there is a dispute as to their original position.

Venusia (vē-nū'shi-ā). [Modern name, Venosa.] Town in S Italy. It was a station on the Appian Way, and the birthplace of the Roman poet Horace (65 B.C.).

Verbanus, Lacus (vēr-bā'nus, lā'kus). [Modern names, Lago Maggiore, Lago di Verbano.] Second largest lake of N Italy. It is traversed by the Ticinus River. It contains the Borromean Islands, and is famous for picturesque scenery. Elevation, about 633 feet; length, about 37 miles; area, about 82 square miles; greatest known depth, about 1220 feet.

Vercingetorix (vēr-sin-jēt'ō-riks). Chief of the Arverni in Gaul, the leader of the great rebellion against the Romans in 52 B.C. He gained various successes against Caesar, but was besieged by him at Alesia and surrendered in 52 B.C. He was exhibited in Caesar's triumph at Rome in 46 B.C., and then by Caesar's order beheaded (c45 B.C.).

Vergil (vē'r'jil). [Full Latin name, Publius Vergilius Maro.] Roman epic, didactic, and idyllic poet; born in Andes, near Mantua, Cisalpine Gaul, Oct. 15, 70 B.C.; died at Brundisium, Italy, Sept. 21, 19 B.C. He studied at Cremona, Mediolanum (Milan), and Rome, perhaps with the idea of becoming an advocate, but a career before the public did not appeal to his retiring nature, and he soon devoted himself to philosophy and poetry. His knowledge of Latin and Greek poets and of Roman history was extensive. Among earlier writers who influenced him was the Latin poet of Epicureanism, Lucretius. There are also many indications in his work of his particular interest in the works of the Greeks Theocritus and Apollonius of Rhodes. His great learning is a very evident ornament of his finest work. In 41 B.C. his paternal estate near Mantua, where he had grown up, was confiscated for the benefit of the soldiery which had assisted Octavian in the civil war against Brutus and Cassius; but he was later indemnified through the intercession of Maecenas. Some think these events were celebrated in the first and ninth of his Eclogues: in the first, the chief figure of the poem is happy to be confirmed in the holding of his land while others about him are losing theirs, and in the ninth the chief figure, a farmer, seeks to prevent the loss of his farm. Whether these two poems are definitely associated with events in Vergil's own life is open to question. However, with the Eclogues Vergil came to the attention of Maecenas (c40 B.C.), who became his patron and benefactor. He also enjoyed the friendship and patronage of Asinius Pollio and Octavian (later Augustus). He was an intimate friend of Horace, whom he introduced to Maecenas. About 37 B.C. he settled at Rome; his later years were spent chiefly in or near Neapolis (Naples), where at his wish he was ultimately buried.

The Eclogues or Bucolics of Vergil, written 42-37 B.C., consist of ten poems generally on pastoral themes. The four books of the great didactic poem, the Georgics (written 37-30 B.C., at the request of Maecenas), celebrate pastoral life, and are considered by some to be Vergil's finest poetry. Crops and the weather are the subjects of the first book, the cultivation of the vine and the olive of the second, farm animals of the third, and beekeeping of the fourth. Lyricism, pathos, and a profound humanity, all expressed with the highest art, pervade these lines in celebration of the rural life. The last years of Vergil's life (c30-19 B.C.) were devoted to the creation of a national epic, the Aeneid (q.v.), that would do for Augustus and Rome what Homer had done for the Greeks, and by a celebration of its past history unite the Romans, not yet recovered from the civil wars, in a loyal nation dedicated to pursuing its destiny under theegis of Augustus. At the time of his death the work had not been completely revised, and he was planning to spend three years in this task. On his deathbed he asked that it be destroyed, but Augustus ordered his literary executors, Varius and Tucca, to publish it as it stood. It has lived as the great Roman epic, second only in classical literature, according to some opinions, to the epics of Homer.

Vergil the Magician. Legendary form which the historical Vergil assumed in the Middle Ages. The Sortes Vergilianae, divination by the use of Vergil's Aeneid, used as early as the 1st century A.D., seems to be the nucleus of his reputation for magic. To this were added certain widespread legends, locally attributed to him but elsewhere to other prominent figures, and around and through this disconnected series of anecdotes was built a fictional biography that made him a great magician and virtually ignored his literary achievements.

Veroia (ve'ryä). [Also: Veria, Verria.] See Beroea.

Veromandui (ver-ō-man'dū-ī). [Also: Viro-mandui.] Ancient people of Belgic Gaul who lived on the upper Samara (Somme) River in the vicinity of what is now St.-Quentin.

Verona (ve-rō'na). City in NE Italy, in Cisalpine Gaul, situated on the Athesis (Adige) River. It was a Celtic settlement in ancient times, and became a Roman colony in 89 B.C. It was the birthplace of the poet Catullus. Verona has one of the best-preserved Roman amphitheatres of Italy, and other Roman antiquities, including a theater, gates, and large archaeological collections.

Verres (ver'ēz), Caius. Roman official; put to death under a proscription of Mark Antony, 43 B.C. He was praetor in 74 B.C., and later, as governor of Sicily (73-70 B.C.), plundered the island of property, art treasures, and the like. The Sicilians brought him to trial (70 B.C.) for his extortions. Cicero, who had offered his services to the Sicilians, undertook his prosecution. Verres was defended by Hortensius, who tried unsuccessfully to delay the trial to the following year when he would be consul. Cicero presented his evidence and Hortensius, unprepared, abandoned his client. Verres went into exile at Massilia (Marseilles) taking much of the loot from Sicily with him. Of the six orations against Verres composed by Cicero, only the first was actually delivered.

Verrucosus (ver-ū-kō'sus), Quintus Fabius Maximus. See Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, Quintus.

Vertumnus (vēr-tum'nus). [Also: Virtumnus.]

Ancient Etruscan or Italic deity taken over by the Romans. Little is known of him except that he came to be regarded as presiding over gardens and orchards, and was worshiped as the god of the changing seasons. In later Roman mythology, Vertumnus fell in love with Pomona, a wood-nymph whose love of her orchards and gardens was greater than any love a man could inspire. To be near her, Vertumnus disguised himself as a laborer and worked in her gardens, orchards, and vineyards. At length he disguised himself as an old crone and visited her. In this disguise he caressed her and told her a parable. Pointing to an elm tree which supported an abundantly loaded grape vine, he said that the tree by itself would be of no use or of any interest, except for its leaves, and that the vine without the tree would lie unremarked upon the ground and unable to bear fruit; each brought usefulness and beauty to the other, and she would do the same if she took a husband. But, as one who loved her, the old crone advised her to take no one but Vertumnus, and proceeded to extol the virtues of that young god and to describe his love for orchards and gardens, so similar to hers. Moreover, Pomona was warned of the vengeance of Venus if she continued to deny the power of that goddess. The words had no effect on Pomona, however, and suddenly Vertumnus resumed his own shining form. Pomona, on viewing the beauty of the youthful god, instantly fell in love with him and gladly agreed to share her gardens with him.

Vescia (ve'shā). One of three oppida (an oppidum was a subject, provincial town), Ausona, Vescia, and Minturnae, of an Italic people known as the Ausones or Aurunci, who occupied the Vescian plain and the valley of the river Liris, on the border between Latium and Campania. According to Livy, these three oppida were captured by the Romans in 314 B.C., after which their independent history ceased, and the site of Vescia was lost. It has been suggested that Suessa (now Sessa) Aurunca, a Latin colony on the southwestern slopes of an extinct volcano now known as Roccamonfina, may reflect an alternate pronunciation or dialectal form of Vescia, in which case Suessa may lie over or near the site of Vescia; but no traces older than the Latin colony have been identified. The name survived in Ager Vescinus and Montes Vescini (JJ)

Vespasian (ves-pā'zhān). [Full Latin name, Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus.] Roman emperor (69–79 A.D.); born near Reate, Italy, Nov. 17, 9 A.D.; died June 24, 79 A.D. He was of humble origin, but rose to distinction in the army, and became consul in 51. He was afterward governor of Africa, and in 67 was appointed commander-in-chief against the insurgent Jews. He was proclaimed emperor in 69. His general Antonius Primus overthrew Vitellius in the same year, and Vespasian arrived at Rome in 70, leaving his son Titus to continue the Jewish war. The chief events of his reign were the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (70), the victories of Agricola in Britain, and the suppression (70) of the revolting Batavians under Civilis. He restored discipline in the army and order in the finances, and expended large sums on public works, including the Flavian Amphitheater ("Colosseum"), which, however, he did not live to finish. He was said to have installed the first public comfort stations in Rome, which in some parts of Europe are still called "Vespasians." On his death he was succeeded by his sons Titus (79–81 A.D.) and the unspeakable Domitian (81–96 A.D.).

Vesta (ves'tā). Hearth-goddess of the ancient Romans, equivalent to the Greek Hestia. She presided over both the private family hearth or altar, and the central altar of the city, the tribe, or the state. She was worshiped along with the Penates at every meal, when the family assembled round the altar or hearth, which was in the center of the house. Aeneas was said to have carried the sacred fire (her symbol) from Troy, and to have brought it to Italy, and it was preserved at Rome by the state in the sanctuary of the goddess which stood in the Forum. There was no image of Vesta; she was represented entirely by the fire. This fire was watched by six virgins, called "vestals," who prevented it from going out. If it did, it was rekindled by friction. Her festival, the Vestalia, was observed June 9–15, during which time her sanctuary was cleaned.

Vestal Virgin. Among the ancient Romans, a virgin consecrated to Vesta and to the service of watching the sacred fire, which was kept perpetually burning upon her altar. Accord-actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; ꝥꝥ, then; đ as d or j, š as s or sh, ʦ as t or ch, ʒ as z or zh.

ing to tradition, the vestal virgins, warned of the approach of the Gauls (c389 B.C.), took the sacred fire from the altars and fled from the city. As they were hurrying along the road with the sacred fire and sacred vessels from the temple, Lucius Albinus, also fleeing the barbarians with his family and household goods in a cart, came upon them. He piously removed his family and goods from his cart, took up the vestal virgins, and carried them to Caere. There they remained until the Gauls, who had taken the sacked Rome, were driven out. Some say that because the vestal virgins performed their sacred rites at Caere these rites afterwards came to be known as ceremonies, for the place of refuge of the vestal virgins. The institution of the vestal virgins was one of the oldest features of Roman religion, and was the last to perish with the rise of Christianity. The vestals were at first two, then four in number, afterward six. They entered the service of the goddess from six to ten years of age, their term of service lasting 30 years. They were then permitted to retire and to marry, but few did so, as it was supposedly unlucky. Their persons were inviolable, any offense against them being punished with death, and they were treated in all their relations with the highest distinction and reverence. A vestal who broke her vow of chastity was immured alive in an underground vault amid public mourning. There were very few such instances; in one of them, under Domitian (51-96 A.D.), the chief of the vestals was put to death under a false charge trumped up by the emperor.

Vestini (ves-tī-nī). Ancient people of C Italy, living E of the Sabines, and probably of Sabine affinities. The Vestini became allied with the Romans c300 B.C., and joined the Marsi in the Social War. They were subjugated by the Romans in 295 B.C.

Vesuvius (vē-sō'vi-us), Battle of. Victory gained near Mount Vesuvius, c340 B.C., by the Romans under Manlius Torquatus and Decius Mus over the Latin League.

Vesuvius, Mount. [Italian, Monte Vesuvio.] The only active volcano on the mainland of Europe, and unquestionably the best-known one in the world, situated on the Bay of Naples, Italy, about nine miles SE of Naples. It has two summits, the volcano proper (about 4200 feet high), and Monte Somma to the N (3730 feet). It was regarded in ancient times as extinct. Severe earthquake shocks occurred in 63 A.D., and the first recorded eruption took place in 79 A.D., destroying Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabiae. The popular belief that Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabiae were overwhelmed by streams of molten lava is mistaken; in the eruption of 79 A.D., Vesuvius sprayed into the atmosphere vast quantities of molten rock in the form of droplets charged with gases, which expanded as in the cooler air the drops solidified, forming lapilli, "pellets" of light, dry, warm "ash" (pumice). It was this ash which covered Pompeii to a depth of 16 to 20 feet, and Stabiae, in some places, to an even greater depth. On the SW slopes of the volcano, however, it rained, and the wet ash, falling to the ground as warm mud, flowed downhill and covered the lower slopes, including the entire resort of Herculaneum, where it hardened into the rock known as tufa, effectively sealing it off from discovery and clandestine excavation until the 18th century. Other more or less notable eruptions have taken place since 79 A.D., the most destructive being those of Dec. 16, 1631, and 1906. (JJ)

Via Aemilia (vī'a ē-mil'i-a). [English, Aemilian Way.] Important ancient Roman highway, the earliest in N Italy, connecting Placentia (Piacenza) and Ariminum (Rimini), where it met the Flaminian Way. Later branches extended from Ariminum to Bononia (Bologna), and thence to Aquileia, and from Placentia to Ticinum (Pavia), and the main road was extended from Placentia to Mediolanum (Milan) and Augusta Praetoria (Aosta). The original highway was built by Marcus Aemilius Lepidus in 187 B.C., and is still in use.

Via Appia (ap'i-a). Latin name of the Appian Way.

Via Aurelia (ô-rē'li-a). [English, Aurelian Way.] One of the chief ancient Roman highways. It was built toward the close of the republic, and extended from Rome, for the most part along the coast, to Pisae (Pisa), whence it was continued along the Ligurian shore to the Maritime Alps, and by Augustus was carried into Gaul. There are considerable remains of the road, notably along the Italian and French Riviera.

Via Cassia (kash'i-a, kas'-). [English, Cassian Way.] Ancient Roman highway which extended from Rome through Etruria to Arretium (modern Arezzo), and thence to Florentia (Florence) and Luca (Lucca). It was in existence before the end of the republic, but the time of its construction is unknown.

Via Clodia (klō'di-a). [English, Clodian Way.] Ancient Roman highway of the time of the republic, extending through Etruria on a line about parallel with the Via Cassia. It was a branch of the Via Cassia, which it left about ten miles from Rome, where its pavement still exists.

Via Egnatia (eg-nā'shi-a). Important ancient Roman military road, running from the coast of the Adriatic at Dyrrhachium (modern Durrës) through Illyria and Macedonia to Thessalonica (Salonika), and thence by Philippi through Thrace to Cypsela (Ipsala), near what is now Edirne. The road, built c130 B.C., takes its name from Egnatia on the Apulian coast. Its length was 534 Roman miles. There are abundant remains of the road, especially near Salonika.

Via Flaminia (flā-min'i-a). Latin name of the Flaminian Way.

Via Latina (lā-tī'na). [English, Latin Way.] One of the great and earliest highways leaving ancient Rome. It ran to Casilinum (near Capua), where it united with the Appian Way. A branch was later carried from Teanum to Beneventum. The Via Latina undoubtedly existed as a road for a long period before it was regularly constructed and paved. The invading forces of both Pyrrhus and Hannibal followed its course.

Via Ostiensis (os-ti-en'sis). [English, Ostian Way.] Ancient highway from Rome to Ostia. It followed the left bank of the Tiber, cutting across the larger bends of the river.

Via Popilia (pō-pil'i-a). Two ancient highways: 1) A highway from Capua to Rhegium that ran, inland, from the Appian Way at Capua for over 300 miles to Rhegium. 2) A 178-mile highway that ran along the Adriatic coast from Ariminum (Rimini) to Aquileia.

Via Portuensis (pōr-tū-en'sis). Ancient highway from Rome to the new imperial seaport Portus Trajani (Civitavecchia). Its course, which can still be followed, is along the right bank of the Tiber.

Via Praenestina (pren-es-tī'na). [English, Praenestine Way.] Very ancient highway from Rome to Praeneste (Palestrina), whence it was continued to join the Via Latina at Anagnia (Anagni).

Via Sacra (sā'kra). [English, Sacred Way.] First street of ancient Rome to be established on the low ground beneath the hills. It had its name either because on its line, according to tradition, Romulus made his treaty with the Sabine chief Tatius, or because on it lay several of the oldest and most revered sanctuaries of Rome. It began at the E end of the Forum Romanum, and ran along the S side of the Forum, past the Basilica Julia and the Temple of Castor and Pollux; then it turned at right angles and crossed the Forum, and turned again to skirt the N side of the Temple of Julius Caesar. It continued in front of the Temple of Antonius and Faustina and the Basilica of Constantine to the Arch of Titus. Under the empire it was extended hence past the Flavian Amphitheater to a point on the Esquiline Hill. The lava pavement of the Via Sacra, as it now exists, is almost all late in date; and it is probable that the course of the street was slightly altered from time to time to meet architectural exigencies.

Via Salaria (sā-lār'i-a). [English, Salarian Way.] One of the most celebrated of ancient Roman highways. It ran from Rome up the Tiber valley to Reate (Rieti), then crossed the Apennines and went past Asculum Picenum (Ascoli Piceno) to the Adriatic. Here it branched, one road running N to Ancona and the other S to Hadria (Adria). The name means "Salt Road," and indicates that it originated in the track by which crude salt had been transported from drying-pans near the Tiber mouth to the interior of Italy since before the time of recorded history. Eventually the track was engineered and paved to Roman standards.

Via Valeria (vā-lir'i-a). [English, Valerian Way.] One of the principal highways of ancient Rome. It continued a road which led from Rome to Tibur (Tivoli) to Lake Fucinus (Fucino) and the Marsic territory, and was afterward extended to the Adriatic at the mouth of the Aternus (Aterno). The time of its construction as far as Lake Fucinus (Fucino) is unknown; its continuation through the Apennines and in the Aternus valley was built by Claudius. Many portions of the roadway survive.

Victor. A Roman epithet often applied to Jupiter, Mars, and Hercules, and sometimes to other gods.

Victoria (vik-tō'ri-ā). In Roman mythology, the personification of victory, equated to the Greek Nike. She was specifically a goddess of the Roman legions, and also of the emperors. Her temple at Rome dates back to 294 B.C.

Victory of Samothrace (sam'ō-thrās). [Also: Winged Victory.] One of the greatest art monuments of antiquity, found in Samothrace in 1863, and now in the Louvre, Paris. The colossal winged figure (of which the head has been lost) stands, with full drapery blown by the wind, on the prow of a trireme. The work is of Hellenistic date.

Victrix (vik'triks). A Roman epithet applied to Venus, Diana, Fortuna, and sometimes to other goddesses.

Vigiles (vij'i-lēz). Corps of police and firemen, organized under military discipline, in ancient Rome. Under Augustus they numbered 7000, were under the command of a prefect, and were divided into seven regiments, each of which had the guard of two of the 14 regiones of the city, and was subdivided into seven companies. The Vigiles were quartered in seven main barracks, or stationes, and 14 subordinate posts, or excubitoria. The remains of several of these barracks and posts have been discovered, and are remarkable for the magnificence of their decoration with marble incrustation and columns, mosaic pavements, statues, and mural paintings.

Villanovans (vil-ā-nō'vānz). Pre-Etruscan people of N Italy, named from a cemetery excavated in 1853 at Villanova near Bologna. Their culture is believed to have been brought (c1000 B.C.) into the region by migrants from north of the Alps, who spread into Etruria, Latium, and through the Bologna area. It is characterized by cremation of the dead and urn-burial of the ashes.

Viminal Hill (vim'i-nāl). [Latin, Mons Viminalis.] Northeasternmost of the group of seven hills of ancient Rome, E of the Quirinal and N of the Esquiline. The baths of Diocletian lie below it to the N.

Vindelicia (vin-dē-lish'i-ā, -lish'ā). [Also: Rhaetia Secunda.] In ancient geography, a Roman province; sometimes united with Rhaetia. It was bounded by the Ister (Danube), the Aenus (Inn) (separating it from Noricum), and Rhaetia. Its chief town was Augusta Vindelicorum (Augsburg). The early inhabitants were probably of Celtic origin. Vindelicia occupied in general what is now the S part of Baden, Wurttemberg, and Bavaria, and the N part of the Tyrol.

Vindicius (vin-dī'shus, -shi-us). In Roman legend, a Roman slave who belonged to the family of the Aquilii. By chance (c509 B.C.) he overheard envoys of the deposed Tarquin plotting with members of the Aquilii and Vitellii families to slay the consuls Brutus and Collatinus and restore Tarquin as king of Rome. He revealed the plot to Publius Valerius (Publicola) who, terrified that the conspirators might act at once if they realized their plot had been exposed, shut Vindicius up in his house and set his wife to guard him. Valerius immediately investigated, found that what Vindicius had said was true, and rounded up the conspirators, who by vote of the Roman people were thereupon slain. To reward Vindicius, Valerius procured a decree from the people granting him the freedom of the city with the right to join whatever tribe of the Roman citizens he chose, and giving him the franchise. Vindicius was the first slave ever to be enfranchised in this manner.

Violet-Crowned City. Name sometimes given to Athens. As seen from Athens, the deforested limestone flanks of Mount Hymettus, when lit by the late afternoon sun, reflect an extraordinary violet light observed nowhere else in nature. The epithet "violet-crowned" was first applied to Athens by the Theban poet Pindar. (JJ)

Virbius (vir'bi-us). In Roman mythology, a minor deity attendant on Diana (Artemis) of Aricia. According to some accounts, Hippolytus, restored to life by Asclepius, was carried in a cloud by Artemis (Diana) to Italy. He married Egeria and became ruler in Aricia under the name Virbius. His appearance and name were changed because it was against divine law for the dead to be restored to life, and the changes were for the purpose of disguising him, even as Dionysus changed the name of his mother to sneak her out of Tartarus and take her to the home of the gods. Virbius built a famous shrine to Diana (Artemis) in her grove at Aricia near Lacus Nemoensis (Lake Nemi). Some say he was the father of a second Virbius by the nymph Aricia. For restoring Hippolytus to life, a deed permitted only to the gods themselves, Asclepius was struck by a thunderbolt of Zeus. Virgil (vēr'jil). See Vergil.

Virginia. In Roman legend, the daughter of Virginius, a centurion, who was slain by her father to keep her from the power of the decemvir Appius Claudius (449 B.C.). This act led to the overthrow of the decemvirate. Virginius (vēr-jin'yus). In Roman legend, the father of Virginia.

gust 23. Also, a zodiacal constellation representing a winged woman in a robe holding a spike of grain in her left hand.

Viriathus (vi-rī'ā-thus, vir-i-ā'thus) or Viriatus (vi-rī'ā-tus, vir-i-ā'tus). Lusitanian shepherd who led a revolt against Rome following the proscriptions of the proconsul Galba (150 B.C.). By means of guerrilla tactics, he conducted a long and generally successful war (149–141 B.C.) against the Romans in the western part of the Iberian Peninsula. Having defeated the generals sent against him, his independence and that of the Lusitanians was recognized by a treaty with Rome. The Roman consul Cnaeus Servilius Caepio broke the treaty (140 B.C.), renewed the war, and bribed three friends of Viriathus to slay him (139 B.C.).

Virtus (vēr'tus). In Roman mythology, the personification of courage, or the manly virtues.

Vitellius (vi-tel'i-us), Aulus. Roman emperor (69 A.D.); born 15 A.D.; killed at Rome, in December, 69 A.D. To say that he was a favorite of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero is to give eloquent testimony of his adaptability, servility, and profound knowledge of all forms of debauchery. He was appointed governor in lower Germany by Galba in 68, and was proclaimed emperor by the army at the beginning of 69. His generals Caecina and Valens defeated Otho, and he entered Rome in the middle of 69. His brief reign was marked by a rise in debauchery and license, but when the forces of Vespasian marched on Rome his followers dwindled. The Romans are said to have insisted that he keep the purple. His forces were defeated by those of Vespasian under Antonius Primus, and he was taken from hiding and murdered.

Vitruvius Pollio (vi-trō'vi-us pol'i-ō), Marcus. [Called Vitruvius.] Roman architect and engineer; born at Verona, Italy; fl. 1st century B.C. He was a military engineer under Caesar and Augustus. His treatise on architecture, in ten books (De Architectura), dedicated to Augustus, is the only surviving Roman treatise on the subject. His taste was strongly conservative. The work continually stresses the merits and charms of the unpretentious Roman architecture of earlier generations, which was rapidly disappearing from the Roman scene as at Augustus' bidding outmoded buildings were remodeled and sheathed with marble revetment or replaced entirely. It has been suggested that Vitruvius wrote in the vain hope of persuading Augustus to return to traditional decoration in stucco and terracotta. His description of a triple-cella temple in the Tuscan style, for example, which has been a source of controversy among historians of architecture for generations, is now regarded as a proposal for a temple he would have liked to build, rather than a description of an existing temple. Nevertheless, the book contains much useful material not elsewhere recorded. It was well known to Pliny the Elder, and on it was based much of the theory and practice of Renaissance and Neo-Classical architecture. (JJ)

Volaterrae (vol-ā-ter'ē). [Modern name, Volterra.] Town in C Italy. It was one of the 12 leading Etruscan towns. Tombs of the Villanovan period have been found nearby. The town fell to Rome in 298 B.C. Ancient walls still surround the town.

Volcae (vol'sē). Celtic people of ancient Gaul, who, emerging from the Ister (Danube) Valley, pushed west and reached the Rhene (Rhine) during the 4th century B.C., and settled in the region later called Languedoc. Split up in their earlier migrations, one group of the Volcae moved through Greece in the 3rd century B.C., creating great havoc. By the time of the Roman conquest of Gaul, the Volcae tribes had already largely lost their tribal identities.

Volos (vō'lōs). [Also: Bolos.] Town in NE Greece, on the coast about 32 miles E of Larissa: main harbor of Thessaly. In the vicinity are many ancient ruins; nearby were the sites of Iolcus and Pagasae, ancient seaports, both of which have been identified as the starting point of the Argonauts, and also of ancient Demetrias.

Volscens (vol'skenz). Named in the Aeneid as a Latin chief, a captain of cavalry who discovered Nisus and Euryalus as they crept through the Rutulian lines at night during the war between Aeneas and the Latins. Firelight reflected from the helmet Euryalus had taken from Messapus, a Rutulian he had slain, and put on his own head. Volscens saw the light flash, ambushed the two friends, killed Euryalus, and was in turn slain by Nisus.

Volscian Mountains (vol'shan). [Italian, Monti Lepini.] Group of mountains in Italy, SE of Rome. They are W of the main chain of the Apennines, and S of the Alban Hills. Elevation, about 4420 feet.

Volscians (vol'shanz). [Also: Volsci.] Ancient Italian people who dwelt in S Latium. They were noted for their long wars against Rome. They were subdued by Rome in the last part of the 4th century B.C. In the Aeneid the Volscians are named as ardent supporters of Turnus in his wars against Aeneas.

Vol siniensis, Lacus (vol-sin-i-en'sis, lā'kus). Latin name of Bolsena, Lake of.

Vol sinii (vol-sin'i-i). One of the twelve capitals of the Etruscan Confederacy, destroyed by the Romans in 280 B.C., thought by some scholars to have stood on the site of Urbibentum, modern Orvieto. The Romans later refounded it some miles to the SW as Vol sinii Novi, modern Bolsena, on the shores of the Lacus Vol siniensis or Lake of Bolsena. (JJ)

Volterra (vōl-ter'rā). See Volaterrae.

Volturnus (vol-tēr'nus). [Modern name, Volturno.] River in Italy which traverses Campania and flows into the Mediterranean Sea about 21 miles NW of Neapolis (Naples).

Volumen (vō-lū'men). Latin, meaning literally "something rolled up, a roll, scroll." From this comes our word volume, but the ancient meaning was different. Prose works were composed in columns on sheets of papyrus eight to twelve inches high and usually not over nine inches wide. These could be glued together to form a roll as long as desired, but for convenient handling they were usually not over 30-35 feet long. For storage they were rolled up, the reader unrolling to expose one or two columns at a time. Before the development of the codex, formed of folded sheets arranged in quires like a modern magazine, written on both sides and bound flat, the necessary preliminary to publishing an extended prose work was to divide it into sections corresponding in length to such rolls. These are the volumina of ancient prose writers. Latin writers often refer to these as libri (books), which is why we have come to speak of the "books" of Herodotus, Thucydides, Livy, Tacitus, etc. Shorter in length than modern

books, they are equivalent to longish chapters of 30–40 pages of print. The volumen was uneconomical, being written on one side only; it was bulky, and therefore wasteful of storage space; and it was difficult to consult for reference. When the codex appeared its superiority ultimately led to its adoption as standard, and the volumen was gradually superseded (JJ)

Voluptas (vō-lup'tas). Sometimes known in Roman mythology as the goddess of pleasure.

Vortumnus (vōr-tum'nus). See Vertumnus.

Vulca (vul'ka). Name of an Etruscan sculptor in terra-cotta of Veii, who, according to Pliny the Elder, made terra-cotta statues for the Capitolium in Rome. (JJ)

Vulcan (vul'kan). In Roman mythology, the god of fire, especially volcanic fire. Originally an independent, and not benevolent, deity, he became completely identified with the Greek Hephaestus, and as such patron of metallurgy and handicrafts. See Hephaestus. Vulcanalia (vul-ka-nā'li-a). Ancient Roman festival in honor of Vulcan, celebrated on Aug. 23 with games in the Flaminian circus, near the temple of the god, and with sacrifices of burnt fishes. It was a festival of appeasement, for the prevention of forest fires and of the burning of granaries.

Vulcania (vul-kā'ni-a). [Modern name, Vulcano.] In ancient geography, an island between the Sicilian coast and Aeolian Lipara. According to legend, it was Vulcan's workshop. It was an island of volcanic origin and was supposed by Vergil to be connected by subterranean channels with Mount Aetna. The island was also called, in ancient times, Hiera.

Vulso (vul'sō), Cnaeus Manlius. See Manlius Vulso, Cnaeus.

Vuvos (vō'vōs). See Cocytus.

—W—

Wall of Aurelian (ô-rē'li-an, ô-rēl'yan). Fortified enclosure of ancient Rome, of irregular outline, extending beyond the Servian Wall, particularly on the N (where it includes the Pincian Hill) and on the E and S (where it takes in the Monte Testaccio), and on the right bank of the Tiber enclosing the Vatican and Janiculum hills. The wall was constructed by Aurelian 271–275 A.D., and was repaired by Honorius, Theodoric, Belisarius, and later rulers; its circuit remains almost unaltered, and measures about 13 miles. The masonry of the wall is for the most part of brick, interrupted occasionally by stonework. Some older pieces in opus reticulatum are incorporated. The exterior height is about 55 feet, and there are 381 rectangular towers.

Wasps, The. Comedy of Aristophanes, produced in 422 B.C. and awarded the second prize. It satirizes the Athenian love of litigation and mocks Athenian judicial processes by presenting a dog prosecuting another dog for stealing a cheese. Of the two judges sitting on the case, one, Philocleon ("Love-Cleon"), is mad. The other, Bdelycleon ("Hate-Cleon"), is wise. Aristophanes is attacking Cleon in this play as he did in others, for the cheese represents Sicily, which an Athenian general was sent to take. Cleon prosecuted the general for shady financial transactions which led to the failure of his expedition to take Sicily.

Weeping Philosopher. Name given to Heraclitus.

Widow of Ephesus. The best surviving specimen of a literary genre once widely popular in Greece and Rome, witty short stories, usually erotic and frequently obscene, known as the Milesiae Fabulae or Milesian Tales. In "The Widow of Ephesus," preserved as a fragment of Petronius' Satyricon, a soldier posted at a crucifixion to prevent the relatives of the criminal from removing the cadaver for burial, hears the sound of mourning in a tomb in a nearby cemetery. He investigates, and finds a distraught young widow weeping over the body of her husband, attended only by her maid. He offers consolation, but while his attention is focused on the widow the relatives take the body down from the cross and escape with it, making the soldier himself liable to the death penalty. The soldier and his new friend are equal to this emergency; they mount the corpse of the husband on the cross and go off happily. (JJ)

Wingless Victory, Temple of. See Athena Nike, Temple of.

Women of Trachis (trā'kis). [Also: Trachiniae.] A tragedy by Sophocles, of uncertain date, which treats the great Heracles—a law unto himself. Side by side with his heroic exploits, his undisciplined passions function, bringing suffering to his intimates and ending in death to his wife, his herald, and himself.

The scene is before the house of Heracles at Trachis. Deianira quotes to her old nurse the proverb: that no one should be called happy or unhappy until he is dead. She recalls her fear of marriage when the river-god Achelous wooed her, and her joy when Heracles overcame him and became her husband. This soon turned to sorrow as Heracles left her for long periods while he engaged in dangerous adventures, and she has known no peace of mind since she married him. They are exiles in Trachis because he killed Iphitus, but where her brave husband is now she does not know. It is 15 months since he left home and she is frantic with worry. The nurse advises her to send her son Hyllus to search for his father. But Hyllus knows where Heracles is. He tells his mother that after serving Queen Omphale as a slave to atone for the murder of Iphitus, he is now free and is waging war against Eurytus in Euboea. This news frightens Deianira, for Heracles had told her that this war would be his last exploit; after 15 months he would either meet his death or spend the rest of his days in peace. Hyllus departs in search of Heracles. A chorus of women of Trachis enters and sings an ode commemorating the suffering and worry of Deianira in her husband's absence. They advise her not to give up hope. Deianira answers that any woman who has been a wife and mother will understand her fears. A messenger enters and announces that Lichas, herald of Heracles, has come. As he talks, Lichas enters accompanied by a group of young female captives. Deianira eagerly demands his news. Heracles has been victorious, he says, and indicates that the young girls are captives he has sent home. In answer to questions, he assures Deianira he does not know the history of one beautiful young captive who has aroused Deianira's pity. He must return to Heracles, who is preparing to sacrifice to Zeus on Ceneaeum. After Lichas departs the messenger tells Deianira that he lied: the young captive was the cause of the war. Heracles fell in love with her and when her father Eurytus refused to give her up Heracles made war on him and ruined his kingdom. When Lichas returns to see what messages Deianira has for Heracles she questions him again about the young captive. He persists in his first story. She begs for the truth. She knows, she says, that the heart of man can change in its affections, and that no man, much less Heracles, can deny the god of love. This is certainly not the first time his affections have strayed, and she would not blame either Heracles or Iole, the innocent victim, but she cannot forgive a liar. Lichas now admits that the captive is Iole, daughter of Eurytus, who so aroused Heracles' desire that he destroyed her father's kingdom to capture her. He had lied to spare her pain. Deianira says she is resigned to this state of affairs and prepares to send gifts to Heracles by Lichas. The Trachinian women sing an ode on the power of Aphrodite, in which they describe the thundering battle between Heracles and the river-god Achelous for the hand of Deianira. Deianira returns from the house and confides that she will not share her house with Heracles' concubine. She refuses to bear the title of wife to Heracles when all the world knows he is Iole's man. She tells the women of her plan to recapture his love. Nessus the centaur once carried Deianira on his back across the Evenus River. He attempted to ravish her but her screams brought quick action from Heracles. He shot Nessus. As Nessus was dying, he advised Deianira to collect the blood that clotted around the arrow, to preserve it in a casket, out of the sunlight, and to use it for a love charm if the affections of Heracles should ever be transferred to another woman. Deianira has resolved to use this love charm at last. She has rubbed it on a tunic which she will send to Heracles by Lichas, and which he will wear when he sacrifices to Zeus. Even as she tells the women of her scheme she wonders if it is an evil thing that she is doing. The women think it is worth a try, and she gives the garment, impregnated with the dried blood of the centaur, to Lichas, with instructions that it must not be exposed to the sun until Heracles is ready to wear it. Lichas departs and Deianira enters the house. She immediately hurries back and tells the women that a bit of wool she had used to rub the centaur's blood onto the tunic fell to the ground and was instantly consumed; purplish bubbles oozed up from the earth on which it had fallen. Greatly disturbed by this portent, Deianira blames herself for believing that the centaur, dying of Heracles' arrow, would have wanted to help her. She now remembers that the arrows of Heracles had been poisoned by the blood of the hydra and desperately fears the effects the tunic, smeared with blood poisoned by these arrows, will have on Heracles. If he dies, she vows to kill herself. The women try to comfort her. Hyllus returns. He accuses her of killing Heracles. He describes the sacrifice Heracles was about to offer when Lichas came with the tunic, and the terrible suffering Heracles endured when he donned the garment and it was warmed by the heat of the sacrificial fire. It seemed to cling to him and sting and burn his flesh. In his agony and rage he hurled Lichas, who had brought it, onto a rock in the sea. But Deianira shall see for herself, for Hyllus has brought his dying father to Trachis. Hyllus calls on the Furies to punish Deianira for killing the greatest man in the world. She silently enters the house, as Hyllus departs to bring in Heracles. As the women of the chorus pity Deianira, who had sought only to regain her husband's love, they hear the sound of weeping. The nurse runs out. Deianira is dead, she cries. After going all through the house saying goodbye to the memories it held for her, she stabbed herself with a sword before the nurse could stop her. As the women mourn, Heracles is carried in on a litter. He cries out in agony and begs for the end of his sufferings. This is the worst torment he has had to endure, he cries.

What monsters, gods, and men could not do to him the perfidious daughter of Oeneus has accomplished. Now he weeps like a girl, he says, felled by a woman. He commands Hyllus to bring his mother out of the house that he may make her suffer with him. Hyllus defends Deianira; she was only trying to win back his love by a charm of Nessus; when she learned of its evil result she killed herself. On learning that his tunic was anointed with the blood of Nessus, Heracles knows he is doomed. With no more thought of Deianira, whose innocence he ignores, he tells Hyllus of certain oracles. It was foretold that no living creature could kill him; only one who had passed the border between life and death could slay him; it is Nessus, his dead enemy, whom he had killed, who is now killing him. He asks Hyllus to swear to carry him to Mount Oeta, build a pyre there, lay his suffering body on it, and set the pyre alight. Hyllus recoils in horror at the command to burn his father's living flesh, but agrees to carry Heracles to Mount Oeta and to build the pyre. Heracles then commands him to marry the captive Iole, for he does not want any man other than his son to possess the women he has possessed. Hyllus protests that he cannot marry the woman who has caused the death of his mother and father, and calls it an act of impiety which he cannot perform, but yields at last and agrees to do it; though it is repugnant to him he will carry out his father's wish. Attendants lift the litter and prepare to carry Heracles to Mount Oeta. Hyllus asks the forgiveness of men for what he is about to do and cries out that the gods look down unmoved on the tragedies of men; all the strange and awful things they have seen, he tells the women of Trachis, come from Zeus.

Wooden Horse, The or Trojan Horse. An immense figure of a horse, built by Epeus, with which the Greeks tricked the Trojans and so took Troy, according to Greek legend. As described by the epic poet Tryphiodorus (5th century A.D.), it was built of wood from the plain of Ida, which had also provided wood for the fleet in which Paris sailed when he abducted Helen. It was white, had a purple mane fringed with gold, eyes of sea-green beryl and red amethyst, and had rows of ivory teeth in its jaws. The harness was purple, inlaid with ivory and bronze. Under the hoofs were wheels for propelling it. It was left on the beach before the walls of Troy. Inside many Greeks were hidden. Included among them was Epeus, although he was quaking with fear, because he was the only one who knew how to operate the lock on the trapdoor by which the Greeks had entered the horse. Sinon, a Greek left behind for the purpose, persuaded the Trojans that the horse was an offering to Athena, and they hauled it inside the walls in spite of the warnings of Cassandra and Laocoön. Cassandra, prophesying the evil it would bring, foretold the deaths of Priam, Polyxena, and Agamemnon, but no one believed her. Laocoön hurled his spear into its side and uttered the warning (as recorded in the Aeneid), "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes." (I fear the Greeks even when they bring gifts.) Laocoön was destroyed by a sea monster and the Trojans mistakenly interpreted this as a punishment for his doubts. Once inside the walls, the Trojans decked it with flowers and performed the Crane dance around it. This was a dance which Theseus did before the altars of Delos, and its winding movements imitated his path as he escaped from the labyrinth of the Minotaur. With joy and relief the Trojans offered sacrifices to the gods, but the fires on the altars fizzled out, the victims didn't burn, the smoke rose blood red from the fires, and statues of the gods wept. Nevertheless the Trojans refused to be warned and went wearily to bed. During the night the Greeks let themselves out of the horse, opened the gates of Troy to their comrades who had returned from behind the island of Tenedos at their signal, and from within the city the Greeks laid waste the Trojan citadel.

Works and Days. Chief work of the ancient Greek poet Hesiod; so named because it deals with the labors of the farmer, and the lucky and unlucky days for performing them.

Xanthippe (zan-thip'ē, -tip'-) or Xantippe (zan-tip'ē). Wife of the Greek philosopher Socrates, proverbial for her shrewish disposition.

Xanthippus (zan-thip'us, -tip'-). Father of Pericles. He was of democratic tendencies, though of aristocratic family, and was partly responsible for the ostracism of Hipparchus (not Hipparchus the son of Pisistratus, but a kinsman) and Megacles. A few years later (484 B.C.) he was himself ostracized at the instigation of his opponents. However, when Athens was threatened by the Persian invasion under Xerxes he was recalled (480 B.C.), and named as one of the Athenian commanders in the war. Following the victory of the Greeks over the Persians at Mycale (479 B.C.), in which he commanded the Athenian fleet, he sailed to the Hellespont (478 B.C.) and captured the fortress of Sestos. After the Persian War he shared the direction of the affairs of Athens with Aristides and Themistocles. About 472 B.C. he joined with Aristides and others to bring about the ostracism of Themistocles.

Xanthippus. Spartan mercenary commander. He organized the Carthaginian army in the First Punic War, and won a victory over Regulus in 255 B.C.

Xanthus (zan'thus). In Homeric legend (Iliad), one of a pair of immortal horses. His mate was Balios. They were the children of Podarge the Harpy, and Zephyrus the West Wind. Poseidon gave them to Peleus the father of Achilles. Achilles loaned them to Patroclus and they wept when he was slain by Hector. Temporarily endowed with speech by Hera when Achilles in his turn yoked them for war, Xanthus promised him a safe return from this battle but foretold that soon thereafter he would be slain by a god and a hero.

Xanthus. In Homeric legend (Iliad), a Trojan, the son of Phaenops. He was slain by Diomedes.

Xanthus. In Homeric legend, the name given by the gods to the river-god of the Scamander River in the Troad. When Zeus at last gave permission to the gods to interfere in the Trojan War as they chose, Xanthus at first took no part. Then, horrified by the slaughter Achilles was wreaking, Xanthus asked him to kill on the plain and not to clog up his waters with Trojan corpses. Achilles scornfully rejected his plea. Then Xanthus rose up in anger, flooded his banks and pursued Achilles with tree trunks and boulders tumbling in his swollen waters and sought to drown Achilles. As the river raged after Achilles, Hera, alarmed for him, called on her son Hephaestus to set the river afire. He did so, and Xanthus surrendered before the holocaust, promised to withdraw from the battle and never to reënter it, no matter what happened. Xanthus had only entered the fray in the first place to protect his clear flowing streams from the pollution of Achilles' victims, which in their great numbers were strangling the river.

Xanthus. In ancient geography, a city in Lycia, Asia Minor, situated on the Scamander (or Xanthus) River near its mouth. It was besieged and destroyed by the Persian general Harpagus c545 B.C., and again by the Romans under Brutus, in 43 or 42 B.C. Important antiquities were discovered (c1838) there by Fellows. Among them is the so-called Nereid monument, a cella with a beautiful Ionic peristyle, dating from the middle of the 4th century B.C. The chief frieze, on the basement, represents a battle of cavalry and foot soldiers; the second frieze illustrates a siege; the third frieze, on the cella, is sculptured with sacrificial and feasting scenes; the fourth frieze, on the entablature, shows hunting episodes and homage to an official personage. The principal parts of the monument have been transported to the British Museum.

Xanthus. [Modern name, Koca.] In ancient geography, a river of Lycia, Asia Minor, rising in the Taurus Mountains and flowing S to empty into the Mediterranean Sea.

Xenia (zē'ni-a). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Hospitable." There was a sanctuary of Athena Xenia at Sparta.

Xenoclea (zē-nō-klē'a). In Greek legend, a priestess of Apollo at Delphi. Heracles applied to her for an oracle to cure his disease, after the slaying of Iphitus. Because he had not been purified she refused to prophesy for him. Enraged, Heracles seized the tripod on which she sat and declared he would carry it off and establish his own oracle. Apollo arrived to protect his oracle and struggled with Heracles. Zeus intervened with his thunderbolt to part the contestants, commanded the oracle to give Heracles answers, and persuaded him and Apollo to become friends.

Xenocrates (zē-nok'ra-tēz). Platonic philosopher; born at Chalcedon 393 B.C.; died 314 B.C. He went to Athens in his youth where he became successively the pupil of Aeschines and Plato. He accompanied Plato on his visit to Syracuse, 361 B.C. He was a friend of Aristotle and when the latter was in Macedon succeeded Speusippus as head of the Academy, over which he presided for 25 years (339-314 B.C.). He served as a member of embassies to Philip II of Macedon and to Antipater. He refused to accept Athenian citizenship when it was later offered him because he disapproved the Macedonian influence in Athens. In his philosophy he closely followed Platonic ideas.

Xenophanes (zē-nof'a-nēz). Greek philosopher; born at Colophon, Asia Minor, c570 B.C.; died c480 B.C. He was a disciple of Anaximander. Driven from his homeland by the Persian invasion of 546 B.C., he traveled widely about the world as a rhapsode. He went to Italy, where he settled at Elea, 540 B.C., and founded the Eleatic school of philosophy. He is among the earliest critics of Greek religious tradition, especially those traditions which clothed the gods in the weaknesses of men. If horses and lions, he said, could make images of gods they would fashion them in their own likenesses. He cried out against the "lies" of Homer and Hesiod, who made the gods thieves and adulterers; rejected mysticism; and proclaimed his concept of a single supreme god who was not made in the image of man and who controlled the universe through thought. He was as scornful of the adulation accorded athletic victors as he was of the unworthy gods of the poets, likening the accomplishments of the athletes to the unthinking animals who perform labors of great magnitude. Fragments of his elegies and his Satires have been preserved.

Xenophon (zen'ō-fon). Greek soldier, historian, and essayist; born at Athens, c430 B.C.; died after 357 B.C. He was a son of Gryllus, of aristocratic background and sympathies. He was a disciple of Socrates. This came about, according to a popular story, in the following manner. In his youth Xenophon was walking in the streets of Athens and was stopped by the philosopher. Socrates asked him where various goods might be secured. The youth answered politely. Then Socrates asked, "And where can you get high-minded men?" Xenophon was unable to answer. "Then follow me," said Socrates. Xenophon did as he was bid, and remained ever after an admirer and defender of Socrates. However, his contact with him must have been of short duration. Proxenus, a Boeotian friend of Xenophon, invited him to join him in an expedition with Cyrus the Younger, brother of Artaxerxes II, the Great King of Persia. Socrates advised him to consult the oracle of Delphi, because he disapproved of the plan. Xenophon did so, but since he had made up his mind to secure the wealth and honor the expedition seemed to promise, he agreed to go on the expedition as a mercenary. At the outset the 10,000 Greeks in Cyrus' army did not know the true destination of their march, and when they learned that they were to fight the Great King it was too late to turn back. The battle was fought at Cunaxa, in Babylonia, 401 B.C. Cyrus was killed, and his oriental troops were defeated, but the Greeks were victorious in their sector. Artaxerxes wished only to rid himself of the 10,000 well-trained, menacing mercenaries. He offered them a guide for the journey to the sea. On the way the generals of the Greeks, as well as their captains, were treacherously slain on the order of their Persian guide Tissaphernes. The Greeks found themselves alone and leaderless in the heart of hostile country, over a thousand miles from Greece. With great presence of mind Xenophon, who had been serving without rank, rallied their spirits, scorned surrender, and proposed the election of new officers to lead them to the sea. He was elected one of the generals and thereafter guided their march, through unknown and dangerous lands, in the face of barbarous enemies, until the glorious day early in 400 B.C. when those in the vanguard raised the joyous cry, "Thalassa!" (The sea!). From the heights above Trapezus they looked down on the Euxine Sea. Here Xenophon gave up his command of the 10,000. He thought of establishing a colony on the Phasis River but abandoned the idea when his life was threatened by those who opposed it. The whole heroic and incredible journey of the 10,000 was described by Xenophon in the Anabasis (the Up-going, i.e., The expedition up from the coast). Simple and direct, in parts almost a day-to-day record of events, the work has great immediacy as a description of stirring events by one of the chief participants. It was written much later, after he had served various Spartan harmosts and the Spartan king Agesilaus, who became his great friend. In 394 B.C. Athens declared war on Sparta. Xenophon was accused of "Laconism" and condemned. Thereafter he accompanied Agesilaus at Coronea in the same year. Afterward he retired to an estate at Scillus near Olympia, given to him by the Spartans, and spent the next 20 years in retirement.

In this period he wrote the Anabasis; the Cyropaedia, an idealized biography of Cyrus the Great in which Xenophon, sacrificing the truth, expressed his ideas on the education of a ruler; the Memorabilia, a defense and description of the life of Socrates as he remembered it, which evolves as a portrait of a man rather than a study of a philosopher. Other works were a Symposium, in which he sought perhaps to correct certain details and atmospheres of Plato's work of the same name; Ways and Means, concerning means of raising money for Athens without resorting to tribute; Hiero, a dialogue on government between Hiero of Syracuse and the poet Simonides; Agesilaus, a eulogy of his friend; Hellenica, a history in which he continues the history of Thucydides, though without that writer's lack of bias and without his accuracy, from 411 B.C. to the end of the Peloponnesian Wars, and on to the battle of Mantinea (362 B.C.). In this work Xenophon criticizes Sparta, which he had always admired greatly, for arrogance, and noted that punishment follows injustice. He also wrote The Oeconomicus which gives advice on household management and outlines the duties of husband and wife; essays on hunting and horsemanship, and other works. After Sparta's defeat by Thebes at Leuctra, 371 B.C., he was forced to leave Scillus and went to Corinth, where he spent his last years. In the meantime he had educated his sons, Gryllus and Diodorus, in the finest tradition. An alliance between Sparta and Athens against Thebes removed the old stigma of "Laconism"; the sons joined the Athenian army, and Gryllus fell at Mantinea, lauded for his courage. The image of Xenophon that comes to us across the centuries is of a noble, honest, heroic, and somehow endearing man, who did what he thought just without ambition, and who left in the Anabasis a stirring record of one of the most thrilling Greek exploits outside the proper history of Greece.

Xerxes I (zêrk'sêz). [Old Persian, Khsayarsha; in the Bible, Ahasuerus.] Son of Darius the Great and Atossa, born c519 B.C.; assassinated 465 B.C. Before Darius became king of Persia he had a wife and several sons. On his accession to the throne, following the death of Cambyses and the murder of the False Smerdis, Darius also took as part of his kingly possessions the wives of Cambyses who had fallen to Smerdis. Atossa was one of these, and came to be one of the most influential of the wives of Darius. To her and Darius, Xerxes was born as their first son and, according to Herodotus, Atossa was determined that he should be the heir rather than his older half-brothers, born before Darius was king and to another wife. It was finally decided, on the advice of the Greek exile Demaratus, that the sons born before the father was king or heir apparent, had no claim to the throne as they were the children of a private person; only the sons born to the king and the wife he had after he became king were legitimate heirs. Demaratus cited a similar instance in Spartan history in support of his point, which he had every wish of making in order to please the queen. Thus it was, that when Darius was preparing a punitive expedition against Greece after the battle of Marathon, he appointed Xerxes as his heir. But Herodotus, who tells this story, adds the comment that with or without the suggestion of Demaratus Xerxes would have been named heir, because of the great influence of Atossa. On the death of Darius, Xerxes duly succeeded him (485 B.C.). At this time revolt had broken out in Egypt, and it seemed to Xerxes more important to put it down than to make an expedition into Greece. In the year following therefore, he marched against Egypt, subdued the country, and crushed it under a more tyrannical rule than that under which it had existed in the time of Darius. In the meantime, Mardonius, cousin of Xerxes, was aflame to win glory for himself, and to this end continually pressed on Xerxes the necessity to punish the Greeks, and at the same time he pointed out the advantages to Persia of extending her sway over Greece. To add to these persuasions, the Pisistratidae came as exiles from Athens to the Persian court and urged Xerxes to march against Greece, in the hope that they would be restored to power in Athens; and envoys from Thessaly also came and invited him into Greece and promised him all assistance should he do so. Xerxes consulted with his generals, and all save his uncle Artabanus agreed that a punitive expedition should be undertaken. They did so out of fear, according to Herodotus. Artabanus advised caution; he pointed out the difficulties; he reminded Xerxes that the lightning strikes the tallest tree, that the gods smite the most powerful men. Moreover, he advised him not to underestimate the Greeks. Xerxes scornfully rejected his advice as cowardly, and in his turn reminded Artabanus of the great deeds his forbears had accomplished with boldness. The decision to make war was made. But on thinking it over Xerxes decided that the advice of Artabanus was good, and he changed his plans. Next day he announced the cancellation of the expedition. All the generals were delighted, save Mardonius. However, according to Herodotus, a vision appeared to Xerxes in a dream and seemed to threaten him with destruction if he did not proceed against the Greeks. He discussed his dream with Artabanus, who tried to explain it away, but when the figure of the dream appeared to Artabanus himself, and threatened him for persuading Xerxes to abandon the expedition, Xerxes and Artabanus concluded that the war on Greece was demanded by the gods.

Preparation now went forward with vigor in the following years. Four years were spent in gathering the host, the largest that had ever been assembled. In addition to a huge land army a fleet was gathered. At last all was in readiness, provisions were stored at strategic points on the route, beasts of burden were collected, cables for bridges were prepared, and the armies were gathered at Sardis. Xerxes sent heralds throughout Greece, except to Athens and Sparta, demanding earth and water as tokens of submission to his rule, for he thought surely they would send the tokens through fear of his overwhelming force. He then (Spring, 480 B.C.) proceeded toward Abydos on the Hellespont, where he had caused a bridge of boats to be constructed so that his vast army could the more easily cross into Europe. Some say that when he set out from Sardis for Abydos there was an eclipse of the sun, a token of ill omen for the Persians. Others say this omen occurred on his departure from Susa for Sardis. In either case, his priests, when called on to interpret the omen, said it foretold destruction for the Greeks, for the sun was the oracle of the Greeks, but the moon was the oracle of the Persians. Xerxes rode forth with his baggage bearers, beasts of burden, polyglot army and their camp followers, spearmen, sacred horses, and an empty chariot of the Persian god Ormazd drawn by eight milk-white steeds. The chariot was empty because it would have been impious for a mortal to ride in the god's car. On the way to Abydos the army passed through Troy, where Xerxes sacrificed 1000 oxen to Trojan Athena and poured libations to the heroes who fell in the Trojan War. At Abydos he reviewed his army from a white marble throne that he caused to be set on a hill outside the city. As he saw the whole plain and the strait filled with his army and his ships, he first congratulated himself and then wept. To the question of Artabanus as to why he wept he replied that it was out of pity for the shortness of man's life, for he suddenly realized (so says Herodotus) that of all his tremendous host not one would be alive in a hundred years. Artabanus was still full of fears as to the outcome of the venture, and warned Xerxes of two great dangers: the land, that would not support the needs of the great army; and the sea, which had no harbors big enough to protect such a fleet in case of storms. Herodotus, who gives these conversations, could invent them after the fact, for it did indeed turn out that Xerxes' army, as other armies in later times that pushed too far from their base of supplies, suffered from lack of food and water; and parts of the great fleet were destroyed by storms. But that was in the future, and Xerxes was unmoved by his fears. After offering a libation from a golden goblet to the Hellespontine waters, or perhaps to the sun, he ordered his host to cross at Abydos. The crossing lasted seven uninterrupted days and nights. When the whole army was across a prodigy occurred: a mare gave birth to a hare. This could only mean, says Herodotus, that Xerxes would lead a great host against Greece but would have to run for his life to regain the point from which he had set out. But this omen as well as others was disregarded.

According to Herodotus, the number in the Persian train, including non-combatants and camp-followers, was 1,700,000. Later scholars estimate the number of fighting men at 180,000. Soldiers from all parts of the Persian empire and their allies made up the army. In the fleet, it was said, were 1207 ships furnished by the Phoenicians, Egyptians, Cyprians, Ionians, Lycians, and many others. Of these, those of the Phoenicians were superior in quality and numbers. Demaratus the exiled Spartan king accompanied Xerxes on the expedition, and was questioned concerning the valor of the Greeks, and whether they would resist the Persians. Xerxes thought they would not. Demaratus assured him on more than one occasion that the Spartans, at least, would never submit, and that if there were only 1000 Spartans they would nevertheless take the field. Xerxes laughed at what he considered to be wild words, and continued his march along the coast of Thrace, crossing the Strymon River and forcing the nations

along the way to join his march. Near the promontory of Athos, across which a ditch had been cut for the passage of his ships, Xerxes separated from the fleet, and the army continued to Pieria, where the heralds he had sent out to demand earth and water from the Greek cities returned. They brought back tokens of submission from many, among them the Thessalians, Locrians, Achaeans of Phthiotis, Thebans, and all the Boeotians except the Plataeans and Thespians. According to Herodotus, the Greeks who did not give tokens of submission took the following oath: "From all those of Greek blood who delivered themselves up to the Persians without necessity, when their affairs were in good condition, we will take a tithe of their goods, and give it to the god at Delphi." Xerxes had sent no heralds to Athens and Sparta, for when his father Darius had done so his heralds to those cities were slain in defiance of the sacred laws protecting the persons of heralds. Although the Persian force was directed in name against the Athenians, the Greeks understood that it was in truth directed against them all, and it was for this reason that many determined to resist the Persian advance. But now that the Persian force was near, the hearts of many failed. Oracles predicted doom and allies deserted, but some of the Greeks maintained their courage. The Persian army reached Thermopylae and the fleet reached Cape Sepias off Euboea without suffering any battle losses. At Cape Sepias a violent storm, caused, the Athenians said, by their prayers to their kinsman Boreas, rose and destroyed 400 of the Persian ships, unnumbered men, and rich treasure. At Thermopylae Xerxes learned the truth of Demaratus' statements concerning the valor of the Spartans, for although the forces of Xerxes won the pass, it was only after the loss of thousands of Persians in the face of the resistance offered by Leonidas and his 300 Spartans and 700 Thespians. After the battle at Thermopylae and an inconclusive sea fight at Artemisium, the Persian army marched down the valley of the Cephissus River and on to Athens. At the approach of the Persians most of the Athenians withdrew with their families to the island of Salamis. A few took refuge on the citadel (Acropolis)

and prepared to resist the Persians. They attacked the citadel, took it, massacred the defenders, and set fire to the temples on the Acropolis and burned Athens. Thus Xerxes had made himself master of Athens and carried out the vengeance his father had intended. But the war was not over. Themistocles the Athenian general, by a stratagem compelled the Greek allies who still had the will to resist to meet the Persian fleet at Salamis. As Xerxes watched from a hill overlooking the bay, he saw his fleet suffer disastrous defeat (480 B.C.). He now feared his restless Ionian subjects would break down his bridges and prevent his return into Asia if he did not fly at once, but to cover up his plans he continued warlike preparations against Salamis. However, he consulted his generals as to whether he should stay and conquer Greece or return to Persia. Only Artemisia the female admiral, of all his advisers, advised him to return to Persia and allay the fears of his people that would arise when they learned of the defeat at Salamis. On her advice and at the urging of Mardonius, he left the latter in charge of a large land force and hurriedly set out for the Hellespont. Arrived there, he found that storms had destroyed his bridge of boats, but his force was now so small that he was able to embark in ships and so return to Asia. On his return to Susa, weakened by the losses his arms had suffered and later by the defeat of the forces he left behind, at Plataea and Mycale (479 B.C.), he became involved with court intrigues. The power of Persia had been so severely weakened that it never fully recovered. Xerxes was assassinated in 465 B.C. in a palace conspiracy. Ahasuerus, the king of Persia who appears in the Book of Esther in the Old Testament, is identified with Xerxes I.

Xuthus (zō'thus). According to Greek tradition, a son of Hellen and the nymph Orseis, and the brother of Dorus and Aeolus. He fled to Athens from Thessaly and there married Creusa, daughter of King Erechtheus, unaware that she had born a son to Apollo. At the shrine of Apollo in Delphi, whither he and Creusa had gone to seek the god's help because they had no children, Xuthus was told that the first person he met would be his son. As he left the sanctuary he met Ion, a young priest of Apollo, and claimed him as his son. Creusa learned, with the assistance of Apollo's priestess, that this was the son she had borne to the god and abandoned, but it was commanded that Xuthus should never know this. Xuthus was to consider Ion as a gift from the oracle at Delphi. Later, Xuthus and Creusa had two sons, Achaeus and Dorus. After the death of Erechtheus, Xuthus, with the consent of the chief claimants to the throne, appointed Cecrops to succeed Erechtheus. His decision was unpopular and he was banished from Athens and died in exile. Through

Xypete (zī'pē-tē). One of the demes or villages of Attica, on the highway from Phalerum to Athens, in which was a temple of Hera in Xypete, sacked and burned by the Persians in 480 B.C., and thereafter left in ruin as a reminder of the impiety of the Persians; still lacking doors and roof, it was seen in the second century A.D. by the traveler Pausanias. The cult continued active in its ruined sanctuary; it appears in 5th-century B.C. financial audits, and possessed a statue of Hera by the sculptor Alcmaenes. (JJ)

Zacynthus (zā-sin'thus). Island of the Ionian group, Greece, about eight miles S of Cephalenia. It has often been visited by earthquakes. According to legend, Zacynthus was a companion of Heracles. He was entrusted with the care of the cattle taken from Geryon, and on his way to take them to Thebes was bitten by a serpent and died on this island in the Ionian Sea which afterward bore his name. The island was a part of the kingdom of Odysseus. It was originally colonized by Achaeans, who roamed the seas and, some say, founded Saguntum in Spain long before the Trojan War. Its position between the Peloponnesus and routes to the west made it an important station. It became a member of the Athenian Confederacy.

Zagreus (zā'grē-us). Divine child of Orphic mythology, later identified with Dionysus. The story is that Zeus, in serpent form, begat Zagreus on Persephone, and intended to bestow on him unlimited power. He set the Curetes to guard his cradle in a cave on Crete, and they clashed their weapons about him even as they had done for Zeus in his infancy. Hera, out of jealousy, induced the Titans to do away with the boy. They daubed their faces with gypsum to disguise themselves and came to Zagreus in the night. First they beguiled him to them with such toys as golden apples, a bull-roarer, dice, and tufts of wool, then they set upon him to kill him. Zagreus attempted to save himself by a series of rapid transformations. He changed himself into a lion, serpent, tiger, and bull, but the Titans grasped him firmly in this last transformation, tore him apart, and devoured him. Athena managed to save the child's heart. Some say she put it into a gypsum figure and breathed life into it, thus making Zagreus immortal; others say Zeus swallowed the heart of Zagreus and thus was enabled to rebeget Zagreus in the new Dionysus, son of Semele.

Zaleucus (zā-lō'kus). Traditional lawgiver of the Epizephyrian Locrians in Italy; fl. about the 7th century B.C. His laws were adopted by the city of Thurii, founded by the Athenians, 443 B.C.

Zama (zā'mā). In ancient geography, a town in N Africa, about 85 miles SW of Carthage. A decisive victory was gained near it in 202 B.C. by the Romans under Scipio Africanus over Hannibal. It ended the Second Punic War.

Zancle (zang'klē). In ancient geography, a town in the NE corner of Sicily, situated on a sickle-shaped harbor that gave the city its name (from the Greek word for sickle). The ancient coins of the city (later named

fat, fāte, fār, fāre, errant; net, mē, hēr ardent; pin, pīne; not, nōte. möve, nōr, Messene) were engraved with a sickle, representing the harbor, within which a dolphin floated. The town commanded the narrow strait between Italy and Sicily. Originally occupied by pirates, it was colonized by Chalcidian Greeks in the 8th century B.C. According to tradition, when the Messenians were defeated by the Spartans in the Second Messenian War those who could escape fled the country. Many of them went to Sicily at the invitation of the tyrant of Rhegium. They defeated the Zancleans in battle, but refused to kill them when they fled to their altars as suppliants. Instead, they exchanged pledges with them to dwell together in peace, raised a temple of Heracles, and changed the name of the city to Messene (c664 B.C.), after their own country.

Zante (zan'tē). Another name for Zacynthus (q.v.).

Zea (tse'ä). See Ceos.

Zela (zē'lā). In ancient geography, a town in Pontus, Asia Minor, at or near what is now Zile, a farm-market town in Turkey. It was the scene of a victory of Mithridates VI over the Romans c67 B.C., and was famous for the victory by Caesar over Pharnaces II in 47 B.C. It was with reference to this battle that Caesar wrote the famous "Veni, vidi, vici" (I came, I saw, I conquered).

Zelesia (ze-lī'ā). Named in the Iliad as a city at the foot of Mount Ida in the Troad. It was the home of the Trojan archer Pandarus.

Zeno (zē'nō). [Also: Zeno of Elea.] Greek philosopher of the Eleatic school, 5th century B.C. He was the favorite pupil of Parmenides. He went to Athens in his fortieth year, during the early youth of Socrates, and resided there many years. He is especially celebrated for his arguments designed to prove the inconsistency in the concepts of divisibility. Zeno's paradoxes were notable advances in the theory of infinity. The best known is the paradox of Achilles and the turtle: If the turtle be given a start, Achilles can never catch him since by the time Achilles reaches the point where the tortoise was the tortoise will have moved, and so on. Another has to do with an arrow in flight;

at any moment the arrow occupies a given position and is therefore at rest; it is thus at rest during the whole flight. His doctrines are referred to in the Parmenides of Plato.

Zeno. Greek philosopher; born at Citium, in Cyprus, 335 B.C.; died 263 B.C. He was the founder of the Stoic school of philosophy. He studied philosophy under the Cynics at Athens, and founded his school, eclectic in its efforts to reach a consistent system, there at the Stoa Poikile ("Painted Porch"), whence its name. See Stoics.

Zeno. Epicurean philosopher at Athens; born at Sidon, in Phoenicia, c150 B.C.; died c78 B.C. He was an instructor of Cicero.

Zenodotus (zē-nod'ō-tus). Alexandrian grammarian and critic; born at Ephesus; fl. in the 3rd century B.C. He was the first head of the Library at Alexandria. He was one of the early scholars to whom we owe our traditional explanation of the works of Homer. He studied the manuscripts of Homer in the Library, omitting lines which he considered spurious or later additions, and giving new interpretations to others. He was responsible for dividing the Iliad and the Odyssey into 24 books.

Zephyrus (zef'i-rus). [Also: Zephyr.] In Greek mythology, a personification of the west wind, poetically regarded as the mildest and gentlest of all the winds. He was the son of Eos and Astraeus, or of Aeolus. By the Harpy Podarge he was the father of the two marvelous horses, Balius and Xanthus, that Achilles took with him to the Trojan War. Zephyrus married the nymph Chloris, who bore him a son, Carpus. The Romans identified Favonius, their west wind, with Zephyrus.

Zetes (zē'tēs). An Argonaut, the winged son of Boreas and Orithyia, and the twin of Calais. See Boreadae.

Zethus (zē'thus). In Greek legend, a son of Antiope and Zeus and twin brother of Amphion. When the twins built the walls of Thebes Zethus boasted of his great strength in placing the huge stones, but Amphion, with his lyre, played so beautifully that the stones slid into place by themselves. According to some accounts, Zethus married Aëdon and was the father of Itylus. According to others, he married Thebe, from whom the city of Thebes took its name. See Amphion.

Zeus (zös). The chief of the Olympian gods, whose power is greater than that of all the other gods together. The dual attitude of the Greeks toward their gods is brilliantly illuminated by their contradictory concepts of Zeus. He is "The Father of gods and men," the supreme ruler who grasped kingly power and from whom the power of mortal kings is derived, as he gave the golden scepter fashioned by Hephaestus to Pelops as a sign of kingship. He is Cosmetas (Orderer), who presides over the state as well as over the family unit. He punishes crime, avenges wrongs, protects suppliants. All the good or evil that falls to the lot of man is distributed by the impartial hand of Zeus, who draws the lot of man from two urns placed at his side and weighs out man's fate on golden scales. He is a god of the sky (his name is derived from a word meaning "bright sky"), who is considered to dwell on all mountain tops, but whose special home is Olympus. Thus he is "Olympian Zeus," the lord of heaven, in whose honor the Olympic Games were celebrated at Olympia in Elis. He wields the thunderbolt and the lightning, he sends the sudden storm. He is "The Cloud-gatherer" who drops the beneficent rain, brightens the skies, or breathes favorable winds as needed. He is the founder and patron of all the institutions of civilization and religion, and the maintainer of justice, law, and order. He is the giver of oracles, with an ancient and revered shrine at Dodona, at Olympia, and other places. Because his will is not always properly understood by mortals he is called "Lord of the crooked counsel." In contrast to the great civilizing and ethical force exerted by the worship of Zeus that pervaded every phase of life, is the Zeus of the Greek myths, abundantly endowed with the frailties and appetites of mortals, and immortally capable of indulging them. It is probable that the legends grew up locally to connect specific local gods or heroes or families with the great god Zeus. As the stories were accepted throughout Greece they were woven into the bewilderingly complex series of relationships, with incidents to explain them, that present Zeus in two violently contrasting aspects—the god to whom all honor and devotion was owed and given as the supreme ruler of gods and men, and the supermortal who could perform, on a lavish scale, all that imperfect mortal men would like to do.

Zeus was the son of Cronus and Rhea, hence his surname Cronides (Son of Cronus). An oracle of Gaea had foretold that Cronus would be overthrown by one of his children, even as he had overthrown his father Uranus. To prevent the fulfillment of the oracle, Cronus swallowed his children as soon as they were born, first Hestia, then Demeter, Hera, Hades, and Poseidon in succession. When the time neared for Zeus to be born Rhea resolved to forestall Cronus. The Arcadians say Rhea went to Mount Lycæus, in Arcadia, and there at a place called Cretea, where no living creature casts a shadow, she gave birth to Zeus. The infant god was washed in the Neda River and then conveyed by Gaea to the nymphs of Crete. The Messenians claim his birthplace was on Mount Ithome in their land. Thebes, Aegium in Achæa, Olenus in Aetolia, Mount

Ida in the Troad, and so many others that, as Pausanias justly says, it would be impossible to name them all, also claimed to be the birthplace of the god. The generally accepted account is that he was born in a cave on Mount Ida, in Crete, or in the cave of Dicte there. When Cronus demanded his last child, Rhea gave him a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes, which he promptly swallowed. The infant Zeus was handed over to the nymphs Adrastea and Ida, daughters of Melisseus. They fed him on honey and the milk of the goat Amalthea, and the Curetes crashed their shields to drown out the infant's cries so that Cronus would not discover how he had been tricked. When Zeus grew up he sought the Titaness Metis who, according to some accounts, was his first wife. She advised him of a potion by which he could compel Cronus to disgorge his brothers and sisters. Zeus disguised himself as the cup-bearer of Cronus and gave him the potion. Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, and Poseidon were cast up, as was the stone Rhea had given Cronus in place of Zeus. The stone was set up at Delphi, and was called Omphalos (Navel), as being the center of the earth. Zeus, with his brothers as allies, made war on Cronus and the Titans. After the war had dragged on for ten years without a decision, Gaea told Zeus he would defeat Cronus and the Titans if he released the Cyclopes and the Hecatonchires (Briareus, Cottus, Gyges) whom Cronus had locked up in Tartarus. Zeus went to Tartarus and killed Campe the jaileress. He took her keys and freed the Cyclopes and the Hecatonchires. The Cyclopes forged the thunderbolt for him, gave a cap of invisibility to Hades, and a trident to Poseidon. With their help Cronus and the Titans were overcome, and all save Atlas were hurled into Tartarus, where the Hecatonchires were set to guard them. Having made themselves masters, Zeus, Hades, and Poseidon cast lots into a helmet to divide the rule of the universe. In the lot-drawing Zeus drew dominion over the heavens, Poseidon over the sea, and Hades over the Underworld. The earth and Olympus were to remain common to all. Because of superior divine endowment, Zeus became chief of the three rulers. He decreed that the oaths of the gods must be sworn by the waters of the Styx, because Styx and her children had voluntarily come to his aid in the war with the Titans. Some say Zeus was harsh in establishing himself as supreme ruler, and that his harshness extended to mankind. He denied them the gift of fire lest they make themselves the equal of the gods, and punished Prometheus, who in his pity for vulnerable and weak man stole fire from heaven and gave it to him. Zeus commanded Hephaestus to bind Prometheus to a crag in the Caucasus, where an eagle daily gnawed at his liver, which was renewed each night. Hera, Poseidon, Apollo, and the other gods, except peaceful Hestia, conspired against Zeus. They overcame him as he slept and bound him with thongs tied with a hundred knots. Thetis the Nereid called the hundred-handed Briareus to untie the knots and secured his release. As leader in the conspiracy, Zeus scourged Hera, and he punished Apollo and Poseidon by sending them to serve Laomedon, king of Troy. The other gods were forgiven on their promise never again to rebel against Zeus.

Some say Gaea, who had helped Zeus overthrow Cronus and the Titans with her advice, was enraged at the punishment Zeus meted out to them and brought forth a race of Giants to war against him. Others say the Giants waged war on Zeus because they were angered at his harsh treatment of their brothers the Titans. Because of an oracle that none of the Giants would perish at the hands of the gods, Zeus sent Athena to find Heracles and bring him to the aid of the gods. He ordered Helios, Selene, and Eos to dim their light, and so stop the battle, while Athena and Heracles searched for a magic herb that would render Heracles invulnerable. When they found it, Athena led Heracles to the Phlegraean Plain, which some say was in Chalcidice and some say was in Italy, where he did valiant service in routing the Giants. Gaea was more enraged than ever, and brought forth Typhon in the Corycian Cave in Cilicia. Typhon attacked the gods in heaven and they fled in terror to Egypt, transforming themselves into various animals to escape his fiery breath; Zeus took the form of a ram, but when Athena accused him of cowardice he assumed his own shape, actor; up, lûte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; đ as d or j, ş as s or sh, ʈ as t or ch, ʒ as z or zh.

hurled his thunderbolts at Typhon and struck him with an adamantine sickle. He struggled with Typhon on Mount Casius in Syria and was overcome. Typhon wrested the sickle from him and cut the sinews of the hands and feet of Zeus. In a helpless condition, Zeus was carried off to the cave in Cilicia by Typhon, who gave him to the dragon Delphyne to guard, and who hid the sinews of Zeus in a bearskin. Hermes and Pan stole into the cave, found the sinews of Zeus, and replaced them on his limbs. With renewed strength he sought out and attacked Typhon. He pursued him to Mount Nysa, where the Fates aided Zeus by deceiving Typhon into stopping to eat some fruits, under the pretense that they would restore his strength. Zeus came up, hurling thunderbolts. Typhon fled to Thrace and made a stand there. He flung whole mountains at Zeus, who parried them with his thunderbolts. They fell on Typhon and so crushed him that the stream ran red with his blood and was henceforth called Haemus (Bloody). As with failing strength Typhon fled through the sea, Zeus hurled Mount Aetna on him and crushed him beneath it forever. There was now no power, god or demigod, to question the authority of Zeus.

Zeus desired the Titaness Metis, and sought to ravish her. She transformed herself into various shapes to escape him, but he seized and violated her. An oracle of Gaea foretold that the child she would bear him would be a girl, and that if she bore him another child it would be a son who would overcome his father. On learning of this oracle, Zeus took a leaf from his father's book and straightway swallowed Metis and her unborn child. He maintained that Metis continued to give him good counsel from inside his belly. After some time had passed, Zeus was afflicted with a violent headache as he walked on the shores of the Lake Tritonis. Prometheus, or as some say, Hephaestus, took up a double-edged ax and smote his brow. Athena, child of Zeus and Metis, sprang fully-armed from his cloven skull. The Titaness Themis bore him the Horae, making him the father of the seasons, and the Moerae. Themis continued to sit by the side of Zeus and give him good counsel, and some call her his wife, but do not explain why she retired from this position. The acknowledged wife of Zeus was his sister Hera. When Zeus first wooed her she rejected his advances. He transformed himself into a cuckoo and approached her in this guise. Hera took up the bird and nestled it in her bosom, whereupon Zeus resumed his own shape and ravished her. The incident was supposed by some to have taken place on Mount Thornax in Argolis, and because of it Zeus was given the surname Coccygus (Cuckoo), and the mountain was renamed Cuckoo. The marriage of Zeus and Hera was celebrated, some say, at Cnossus in Crete. In the temple that was raised on the spot sacrifices were annually offered, and a ceremony was held that reenacted the marriage. Zeus and Hera spent their wedding night, said to have lasted 300 years, on the island of Samos. Hera bore Ares, Ilithyia, and Hebe to Zeus. Their marriage, the only proper marriage on Olympus, was stormy, and marked by continual quarrels. With her spying and her constant recriminations Hera often brought humiliation on Zeus. There was always material at hand for a dispute. On one occasion they argued about which sex enjoyed love-making more. Zeus maintained that the female gets the most pleasure from making love. Hera insisted that women were mere instruments of masculine pleasure. They submitted their dispute to the Theban Tiresias for judgment. He was an authority because he had spent part of his life as a woman. Tiresias declared that if the parts of the pleasures of love-making counted as ten, the female enjoyed nine and the male one. Some say Hera was so vexed by his opinion that she blinded Tiresias. Zeus awarded him long life and prophetic powers. As the wife of Zeus, Hera had great powers and shared his confidence in many respects, but she could not control his interest in and intrigues with other women—goddesses and mortal maidens—despite the jealous watch she kept over his activities. He was the master, and made it plain that he would brook no interference. When Hera incurred his displeasure, as when she caused Heracles to be shipwrecked on the island of Cos, Zeus attached golden bracelets to her wrists and hung her out of heaven, with

anvils attached to each of her feet. He had always the thunderbolt at his command to punish any impertinence or rebelliousness, and he had the power to cast out of heaven any who roused his anger, as he hurled Hephaestus to earth for interfering in one of his quarrels with Hera, and as he cast Ate, goddess of folly, out of heaven because she betrayed him into making a rash oath before the birth of Heracles.

Zeus was the father of many famous children—gods, demigods, and heroes. Some say Aphrodite was his daughter by the Oceanid Dione. Leto, daughter of the Titans Coeus and Phoebe, bore him the twin gods Apollo and Artemis. Maia, daughter of Atlas, was the mother of his son Hermes, whom he made the patron of travelers, commerce, and of treaty-making, as well as messenger of the gods. The god Dionysus, whose nurses he transferred to the heavens as the Hyades, was his son by Semele. Eurynome, a daughter of Oceanus, bore him the Charites (Aglaia, Euphrosyne, Thalia). Mnemosyne, with whom he lay for nine nights, bore him the Muses. He was the father of Demeter's daughter Persephone, and looked the other way when Hades carried her off, but later ordered Hades to restore her to her mother. He transferred the Pleiades to the heavens to save them, some say, from the unwelcome attentions of Orion. Of the Pleiades, Taygete was the mother of his son Lacedaemon, and Electra of his sons Iasion and Dardanus, the former of whom Zeus slew with a thunderbolt for lying with Demeter in a "thrice-plowed field." Some say he was the father of Pan by Hybris. Elara bore him Tityus. The first mortal woman Zeus embraced was Niobe, daughter (or wife) of Phoroneus; she bore him Argus and, some say, Pelasgus. In a celebrated incident, he pursued Io, daughter of the river-god Inachus, and when about to be discovered by Hera, he transformed Io into a white heifer. After long, tortured wanderings in this form, Io reached the Nile. There she assumed her own shape, Zeus "touched" her, and she bore him Epaphus. Among his other famous children (see separate entries) were Helen and Polydeuces, the children of Leda; Minos, Rhadamanthys, and Sarpedon (allowed by Zeus to live for three generations), sons of Europa; Perseus, son of Danaë, whom he visited in a shower of gold; Amphion and Zethus, sons of Antiope; Arcas, son of Callisto whom he transformed into a bear to save her from the wrath of Hera and whose image he placed among the stars as the Great Bear; Aeacus, for whom he transformed ants into men, son of Aegina; and Heracles whom he made immortal, the son of Alcmene, the last mortal woman Zeus embraced. And some say he was the father of Endymion, who chose to remain ageless in eternal sleep; of Hellen, the ancestor of the Hellenes; and of many others. He vied with Poseidon for the favors of the Nereid Thetis, but when informed by an oracle of Gaea that her son would be greater than his father he gave her to a mortal, Peleus, in marriage.

As a god who punished wickedness and avenged wrongs, Zeus sent a great flood to destroy the men of the Bronze Age for their evil ways. From the flood Deucalion and Pyrrha were spared because of their piety, and in answer to their prayers Zeus instructed them how to repopulate the earth. Some say he sent the flood because of the wickedness of Lycaon and his sons. For from time to time Zeus visited the earth in disguise to test the hearts of men. When he came to Lycaon's house he was served with human flesh. In disgust at such wickedness Zeus overturned the banquet table and resolved to wipe out mankind with a flood. Others say he first turned Lycaon and his sons into wolves and then sent the flood. But when he visited the humble house of Baucis and Philemon, and was hospitably welcomed and entertained by the poor and devoted couple, he rewarded them by granting them their wish that they might die together. Salmoneus, who in his arrogance imitated the lightning and thunder of Zeus, who took away the sacrifices of the god and ordered them made to himself, was struck down by a thunderbolt. Alcyone and Ceyx in their pride likened themselves unto Hera and Zeus. Zeus transformed them into a kingfisher and a gannet respectively. In anger at the murder of Apsyrtus by Jason and the Argonauts, Zeus sent great storms to blow the Argonauts off their course as actor; up, lūte, pull; oi, oil; ou, out; FH, then; d̥ as d or j, s̥ as s or sh, t̥ as t or ch, z̥ as z or zh.

they sailed for home. Some say that in the war of the Seven against Thebes, Zeus struck the Argive Capaneus with the thunderbolt for his boast, as he scaled the walls of Thebes, that not even the gods could stop him. He caused Tantalus to suffer fearful torments in Tartarus for abusing the friendship of the gods, and he fixed Ixion to a fiery wheel that whirls in the wind for boasting that he had lain with Hera. In fact, Ixion had embraced a cloud, made by Zeus in the shape of Hera to trick him and test him.

Many times Zeus acted as mediator in quarrels. When Apollo and Idas were fighting for Marpessa, he parted them and granted Marpessa the right to choose between the god and the mortal. On another occasion he came upon Apollo and Heracles fighting over the tripod at Delphi. He parted them with a thunderbolt and made them agree to become friends. When Laelaps, the hound fated to catch whatever he pursued, hunted the Teumessian vixen, fated never to be caught, Zeus solved the dilemma by turning both to stone. In the dispute between Athena and Poseidon for control of Athens, he appointed the gods and goddesses as judges. When they vied for Troezen he decreed that they must share it. Some say that he arbitrated the dispute between Aphrodite and Persephone for the love of Adonis, but others say he was disgusted by their sordid quarrel over the handsome youth and appointed Calliope to settle it. And he wisely refused to say for whom the golden apple was intended. It was inscribed "For the Fairest," and was flung among the wedding guests, at the marriage of Thetis and Peleus, by Eris, goddess of Discord. He referred Athena, Hera, and Aphrodite, the chief contenders for the apple, to Paris for a decision.

Mount Ida in the Troad was especially sacred to Zeus. In the Iliad, Homer represents that Zeus observed the Trojan War from his place on this mountain. The connection of Zeus with Troy was particularly close. Dardanus, the ancestor of the Trojans, was his son. Ganymede, son of Tros, king of Troy, was carried off by an eagle of Zeus to be his cup-bearer on Olympus. This was an insult to Hera, whose daughter Hebe had hitherto filled this function, and was an additional reason for Hera's hatred of Troy and an extra cause of dissension with Zeus. When Ilus had built Troy, he asked Zeus for a sign that his city found favor in the sight of Zeus. In answer to his prayer the Palladium fell from heaven. Some say it landed before the tent of Ilus. Others say it fell into the temple of the Citadel, which was still unroofed, and landed on the place where it ever after stood. Apollo and Poseidon with, some say, the help of Aeacus, built the walls of Troy when they were compelled by Zeus to serve Laomedon. Some say that Zeus and Themis planned the Trojan War to glorify his daughter, Helen, by embroiling Europe and Asia for her sake, or to exalt the race of the demigods. In the war, Zeus promised Thetis that he would allow Hector and the Trojans to harass the Greeks until Agamemnon had atoned for the dishonor he had brought her son Achilles. He did this knowing that it would be a cause of bitterness to Hera, who favored the Greeks, and because he owed something to Thetis for having brought Briareus to his aid when he was bound by Hera, Apollo, and Poseidon. During the last year of the Trojan War he warned the gods and goddesses not to interfere on either side, and went off to Mount Ida to weigh the scales in favor of Hector, in fulfillment of his promise to Thetis. He sent Iris to forbid Athena and Hera to aid the Greeks against Hector, and foretold that Hector would not cease from battle until Achilles rejoined the war to avenge the death of Patroclus. In this, Zeus said that so Fate had ordained and that he was powerless to interfere with Fate. As the Trojans drove the Greeks back with heavy losses, Hera borrowed Aphrodite's magic girdle and so charmed Zeus that he forgot the battle for a while, and then was lulled by Sleep, who had been bribed by Hera. When he awoke and realized what had happened he threatened Hera, and ordered her to secure the withdrawal of Poseidon from the battle. After the death of Patroclus, Achilles re-entered the war to avenge him, and Zeus now gave permission to the gods to take sides as they liked, for he feared lest the fury of Achilles bring immediate destruction on the Trojans if the gods did not take part. And, according to Homer, Zeus laughed in Olympus when he saw the tumult stirred up by Achilles against the Trojans and by the gods as they struggled among themselves. Zeus pitied Hector and would have saved him, but when he weighed his fate in the scales against the fate of Achilles, "down sank the doomful day of great Hector," and Zeus knew that the time had come for Hector to meet his black fate. But when Achilles killed Hector and abused his body, Zeus was angry. He sent Priam to ransom Hector's body and commanded Achilles to treat the old man kindly and to restore to him the body of his son. In the end, as Fate decreed, Troy was destroyed.

The countless epithets of Zeus, describing his special powers, incidents connected with his worship, protection, divine intervention, places of worship, etc., are too numerous to describe individually. The eagle and the oak were sacred to Zeus. His worship was universal throughout Greece by the time of Homer, who describes him with due honor as "the father of gods and men," the god of grace and mercy, the protector of oaths, and of the rights and privileges of hosts and guests. He is the mightiest of the gods, "the Thunderer," "the Cloud-gatherer," the "Olympian lord of the lightnings," and the counselor who by a nod of his immortal head grants the prayer of the suppliant. He is the avenger of wrongs and the giver of victory. All the institutions of civilization and religion derive from Zeus, as do the powers of the other gods. The Romans identified their Jupiter with Zeus, and added the Zeus myths to the ancient Jupiter mythology. In art, the most famous statue of Zeus was the huge ivory and gold image made by Phidias for the temple at Olympia. See Olympian Zeus.

Zeuxis (zök'sis). Greek painter; born at Heraclaea, in Lucania; fl. at the close of the 5th century B.C. He formed his style at Athens under the influence of Apollodorus, worked at various other cities, and finally settled at Ephesus. He is said to have introduced light and shadow into his paintings to give mass. He was also especially successful in achieving illusion. The story is told of a contest between him and Parrhasius. Zeuxis painted grapes so lifelike that birds came and pecked at them. Parrhasius painted a filmy drapery that deceived Zeuxis. Among his principal works were Zeus on His Throne Surrounded by Gods, Eros Crowned with Roses (in the temple of Aphrodite at Athens), the Marsyas (in the temple of Concord at Rome), the Centaur Family (described by Lucian), the Alcmene of the Argentines, Heracles as a Child, the Helena (in the temple of Lucanian Hera), and the Boy with Grapes.

Zodiac. An imaginary band in the sky, 16° wide, within which lie the paths of the sun, moon, and major planets, and having as its center the plane inclined to the earth's equator which defines the yearly path of the sun, called the ecliptic. The ancients, with their preference for duodecimal reckoning (12 is divisible by 2, 3, 4, and 6, 10 only by 2 and 5), thought to see a divine order in a 360-day year of twelve 30-day months (the fact that the actual figures are 365.2425 days, c12 $\frac{2}{19}$ months, and 29 or 30 days was not permitted to interfere with this idealization of the universe). They accordingly divided the ecliptic into 360 degrees, one degree supposedly marking one day's motion of the sun, and looked for, and found, 12 constellations which could be considered as marking each one 30° segment of the ecliptic, one month's movement of the sun. These are the constellations or "Signs" of the zodiac, among which move the seven planets. The Greek names of the constellations of the zodiac, with their Latin and English equivalents, are

Tauros	Taurus	Bull

Karkinos	Cancer	Crab
Leon	Leo	Lion

Zoïlus (zō'i-lus). Greek rhetorician and cynic philosopher; fl. in the 4th century B.C. He was called Homeromastix (Scourge of Homer) from his severe criticisms of Homer, whose works had too much of the fabulous for Zoïlus' taste. His name came to be applied to any carping critic.

Zone (zō'nē). In ancient geography, a place in Thrace where, according to tradition, wild oaks stand in ranks just as they were left, after having been led to this place from Pieria by the music of Orpheus.

Zoster (zos'tēr). In ancient geography, a place on the coast near Athens. The name, which means "Girdle," was given to it because here Leto, preparatory to bringing forth her children, loosened her girdle. The site was marked by altars to Apollo, Artemis, Leto, and Athena.

Zosteria (zos-tē'ri-a). Epithet of Athena, meaning "Girder." Amphitryon dedicated an image of Athena Zosteria at Thebes, because here he put on his armor when he went to fight against Chalcedon and the Euboeans. Some say Heracles raised two stone images to Athena Zosteria at Thebes after his successful defence of the city in the war with Erginus.

aeological sites, including recent discoveries. It describes structures, statues, paintings, festivals. It includes definitions of words associated with the achievements of the Classical Period, synopses of such epics as the Iliad, Odyssey and the Aeneid, and the dramas of Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides. It also contains special articles on such subjects as Drama and Religion.

114 line drawings placed throughout the text depict ancient ideas of gods, heroes and monsters, as well as incidents from mythology and epic poetry. Over 100 photographs illustrate developments in architecture, sculpture, vase-making and painting, coinage, seal engraving, and engineering. End-paper maps show the Greek world of the 5th century B.C.; the Roman Republic of 264 B.C.; and the Roman Empire at the time of Hadrian.

The goal of THE NEW CENTURY CLASSICAL HANDBOOK is to combine in one reference work information now scattered through hundreds of books, to arrange it so that this information will be quickly and easily found, and to present it in a stimulating and informative manner.

Here is what some leading authorities say about THE NEW CENTURY
CLASSICAL HANDBOOK —

“... lucid, comprehensive and sumptuous publication. The principles of compilation are concisely laid down in the preface and I think their realization in the work itself is altogether admirable.”

—MARY RENAULT, author of The Last of the Wine,
The King Must Die, The Bull from the Sea

“... a tribute both to American scholarship and book making ... a truly comprehensive guide to Greek and Roman civilizations ... an admirable combination of authority, legibility and accessibility, and at a reasonable

—JOHN BARKHAM
Saturday Review Syndicate

“... rich feast of material ... a reference work which one can consult with profit and pleasure ... I particularly liked ... the presence of two helpful maps, the modern geographical names included under the ancient sites, the
graphs are not only well chosen but arranged intelligently for comparison of various types and various periods in art and architecture ... and it is good to find by-ways of classical culture that are new, fresh, and even, at times, humorous.”
